Lasallian Values:

Nursing in Action

In 2000, La Salle University's School of Nursing celebrates 20 years of educational excellence and service to the healthcare system and community at large. The School of Nursing also epitomizes a much longer tradition: the Lasallian mission of humanistic Catholic Christian education. Lasallian values are greatly needed in contemporary America as they were desperately necessary in pre-Revolutionary France.

These values appear simple but are profoundly meaningful in the context of people's lives. St. John Baptist de La Salle believed that good teaching is critically important. He also believed that the development of personal spirituality, a strong relationship with God, was inextricably linked to the fullest meaning of being educated. St. La Salle emphasized that "touching the hearts" of students was central to the role of the teacher, an idiomatic way of describing the deeply, meaningful relationship that should occur between educators and pupils. He considered education not merely a task but a spiritual activity. St. La Salle believed (and lived) that education should be clearly directed to helping the poor to improve their lives and strengthen their relationship with their Creator. Most importantly, St. La Salle advanced the critical idea that educated people should use their skills and abilities to improve the lives of others through service, financial support, and the promotion of personal empowerment via education. In many ways, these Lasallian values and tenets have been, are, and will be enacted in La Salle University's School of Nursing.

In 20 years of existence the School of Nursing has become well-known for its quality education. Many graduates have continued their education to the master's and doctoral levels. Nursing faculty members have mentored their former students to achieve, but it is done with the goal of graduates' helping other people. La Salle graduates (and I am one) talk freely of how past and current La Salle nursing educators have been very special actors who helped them live more meaningful lives, "touched their hearts," and inspired them to improve nursing care for all people.

The School of Nursing is also well-regarded for its success in educating students of diverse cultural and religious backgrounds. Academically and financially challenged students are supported and nurtured, but are also tested with a rigorous program of study. Current student achievement rates in obtaining professional nurse licensure attest to the fact that this simultaneous cherishing and challenging of learners is highly successful (and very Lasallian).

La Salle nursing faculty members also demonstrate their incorporation of Lasallian values in many other ways. Almost all nursing faculty members engage in active clinical practice, usually with urban, high-risk, underserved populations. They bring their scientific, educational, and caring expertise to bear on improving the care of the mentally ill, the acutely ill, the substance abusing, the chronically wounded, and those accidentally traumatized.

As they immunize poor, neglected children against infectious disease, as they perform life-saving surgery, as they dress a pressure ulcer so it will heal more quickly, as they teach the poor to help themselves to have healthier life styles, La Salle nurses remember they are in the holy presence of God. La Salle nursing faculty members are engaged in preparing the next generation of nurses. In this mission, they remember they are together and by association with the larger worldwide ministry started by St. La Salle. The Lasallian tradition of humanistic and Catholic Christian education continues into the new millennium. The School of Nursing will play a major role in the active instituting of Lasallian values and in the enactment of St. John Baptist de La Salle's mission for future students.

A Tradition of Caring

by Caitlin Murray

In an age when a former actor was new to the White House, The Shining was at the top of the box office, John Lennon's death was making headlines, and personal computers hadn't hit the shelves yet, La Salle University (still a college) was just laying the groundwork for what would eventually become a nationally recognized School of Nursing.

On the occasion of its 20th anniversary, La Salle's nursing program celebrates the success it has achieved, the challenges it has endured, and the ideals that have remained constant since its inception.

"Though times have certainly changed, the same principles that the nursing program was founded on 20 years ago are still alive today," said Zane Robinson Wolf, Ph.D., R.N., FAAN, the first full-time faculty member in the program, and the current Dean of the School of Nursing. "The students always receive special attention here; we value learning as a lifelong endeavor, and we respect the experience adult learners bring with them to the classroom."

When asked what is responsible for the nursing program's continued success, Wolf cited the special relationship between the faculty and students.

"The students are the only reason we're here," she said. "We have always remembered that. And we have a great sense of respect for what students bring with them as people—the challenges they have experienced in their lives—to the classroom."

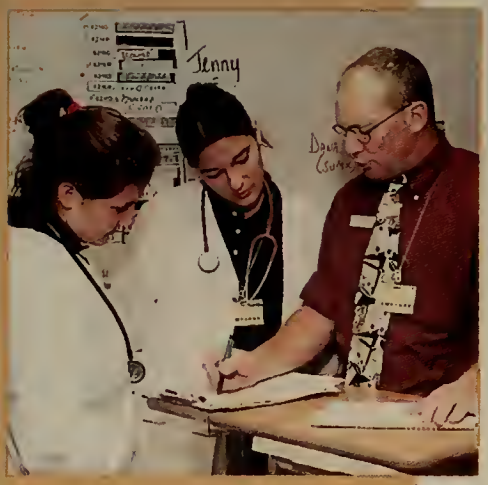
Looking Back

Beginning with a modest facility, budget, and supplies, La Salle launched a part-time baccalaureate degree program for working nurses in its evening division and weekend college in the fall of 1980. With only two full-time faculty members on board, 36 students were admitted to the major.

More than two decades later, the R.N.-B.S.N. completion program has evolved into a School of Nursing offering a full-time generic bachelor's degree, a bachelor's degree for LPNs, a six-track master's degree, four post-baccalaureate certificate programs, distance learning courses, and a nurse-managed health center that has expanded to three sites. The first graduating class in 1982 had 19 students. Almost 1,700 have since earned degrees.

The University's interest in nursing actually dates back much further than 1980. It began in 1967 when a cooperative educational program was initiated with St. Joseph's Hospital School of Nursing, in which liberal arts and science courses were taught by La Salle professors. Similar arrangements were later made with Germantown Hospital in 1970 and Presbyterian Hospital in 1973. A year later, La Salle entered into a dual enrollment program with Gwynedd-Mercy College.

Since enrollment was limited and most courses at Gwynedd were only offered in the daytime, La Salle recognized the need to establish a more practical degree program for working nurses who wanted to progress to a higher level of professional competence. It was then that the possibilities of an undergraduate nursing program at La Salle were explored.



As part of their clinical experience at Albert Einstein Medical Center, La Salle nursing students work with nurses, physicians, and other healthcare professionals.

The Pioneers

One of the staunch supporters of such a program was Brother James J. Muldoon, then dean of Arts and Sciences. A nurse before he became a biochemist, Br. James was part of the team of La Salle professors who taught science classes for Germantown Hospital's School of Nursing in the '70s. He was the first to assemble a group of local nurse leaders to conduct a feasibility study for a baccalaureate degree for working nurses on campus. Some say it was through his efforts that nursing found a home at La Salle.

Janice M. Beitz, '83, Ph.D., R.N., CS, CNOR, CWOCN, the current Director of Graduate Nursing, recalls the stellar teaching of Br. James, who taught her when she attended La Salle through Germantown Hospital's Diploma School. When she reflects back on her days as an R.N.-B.S.N. nursing student at La Salle, she also cherishes the excellent teaching of Wolf, Catherine Stahler-Miller, and Doris Cook Sutterley.

"They set the stage for the way we treat our students today," Beitz said. "They created a flexible learning environment for working nurses and always respected the adult learner. We weren't rookies by any means, and they didn't treat us like we were."

Pregnant with her first child and working as an operating room nurse at the time, Beitz could appreciate a program that allowed her to maintain a full-time position while earning her degree, without repeating what she had already learned in diploma school.

Joanne Serembus, '84, Ed.D., R.N., CCRN, the current Director of Undergraduate Nursing at La Salle, remembers Sutterley's emphasis on the holistic health and her quest for lifelong learning.

"In the '80s, holistic healthcare was considered non-traditional in Western medicine, but we were ahead of the time," Serembus said. "We were taught to focus on the mind, body, and spirit—not just the medical aspect of health. We learned about stress management, self-reflection, and other alternative strategies that weren't embraced at the time."

Growing Pains

Though much of the nursing program's history speaks of its continued progress, some challenges were also met along the way.

Not only was the program's initial accreditation denied at first, but the nursing faculty also ran into some initial resistance on campus.

"It was tough for a while, but there was never a time when I thought we couldn't do it," said Wolf, referring to herself and Gloria Donnelly, a former professor and founding director of the program. "There were certain prejudices against nurses—a mentality that we only did the 'dirty work' so to speak—that academics didn't welcome in the beginning. It was also difficult having a female-dominated program at a time when women were still relatively new to La Salle's campus." (La Salle became co-ed in 1970.)

Perhaps it was the dedicated faculty's Herculean work ethic, or their taste for the seemingly insurmountable challenge that helped them pull through. Whatever it might have been, it undoubtedly worked.

By February 1984, the program had gained National League for Nursing accreditation. Shortly thereafter, a Master of Science in Nursing with three tracks was created.

Under Donnelly's direction, the program—which had grown into its own department within the School of Continuing Studies—had become one of the largest nationally for graduates of associate degree and diploma nursing programs.

As the ninth year of the program approached, plans for new offices to house the department were under way. "We literally started out in a closet—with no fire exit and one door," Wolf recalled. "We were thrilled to find out we'd have new offices that actually had windows!"

What had once been a part-time program in the evening division and weekend college had earned the status of a School of Nursing in May 1992, with the assistance of a grant from the Connelly Foundation. By the following spring, 100 percent of the faculty had earned doctoral degrees and a full-time bachelor's degree program had been created. The School had quickly placed itself in the forefront of nursing education.

Reaching Out

Established in June 1991 as one of the country's first nurse-managed public health and primary care facilities, La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center has added to the School's national reputation. With its expansion to three sites in the Germantown and surrounding areas, the Center provides primary care to approximately 30,000 patients a year and has established itself as a national model for promoting the overall health and well-being of an urban community.

Each undergraduate nursing student has one or more clinical experiences through this health center model, as do all public health nursing graduate students. This model has been recognized by the Health Services Resources Administration and its Division of Nursing, as well as the Pennsylvania Public Health Association. Of particular note and pride for the Center is the Community Health Impact Award it received from SmithKline Beecham in 1999.

Katherine K. Kinsey, Ph.D., R.N., FAAN, a nationally recognized grants writer and Director of the Center, takes pride in the Center's commitment to community service and to the students. "The work of the Nursing Center reflects the School of Nursing's and the University's philosophy of service, particularly to the disadvantaged in our service neighborhoods."

The School of Nursing also provides service to the community through its strong ties with a number of Philadelphia hospitals, healthcare institutions, and community centers, including Albert Einstein Medical Center, Chestnut Hill Hospital, Belmont Psychiatric Center, and Moss Rehabilitation.

"La Salle's School of Nursing, particularly through the work of Kay and the other dedicated staff at the Nursing Center, truly epitomizes the Lasallian mission of serving others," Beitz said. "Not only are we using education to improve students' lives, but we are counting on our students to go out and improve the lives of others. After all, that's why we're here—to empower people to improve their lives.

"That is why I always teach my students that nursing is a liberator for many men and women," Beitz added. "It offers them the opportunity to do something meaningful. We should never doubt the power of doing something meaningful for others."

On the Horizon

With a milestone 20 years behind them, the School of Nursing faculty are looking forward to what lies ahead.

"As the demand for nurses continues to increase, we hope to increase our resources to meet the needs of the community and to continue to provide our students with a solid educational foundation so that they may go out into the community and provide safe care," Serembus said.

A few of the things the School's administrators hope to accomplish in the coming years include offering more classes at La Salle's Bucks County Center in Newtown (a part-time, evening and weekend generic B.S.N. program will begin at the Center next fall), increasing the number of courses available on-line, and strengthening ties within the community. Other foci include the expansion of the Speech-Language-Hearing Science Program and the Nutrition Program, an increase in faculty and student research, and continuing excellence in teaching and learning.

"We will continue to strive to provide a quality education to our students so they can in turn make a difference in people's lives," Wolf said. ❙

20th ANNIVERSARY GALA

Sunday, June 10, 2001
Brunch, 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.
Adam's Mark Hotel, Philadelphia

The School of Nursing is producing a commemorative video and display of its history.

- Send in your memorabilia: Anything that can be scanned or displayed, such as photos, posters, projects, videos, etc.
- Contribute an item for the silent auction: jewelry, gift packages, special skills or services, nursing novelties, art, etc.
- Solicit an item for a give-away drawing.
- Have your company contribute small items for gift bags, such as key chains, pens, etc.
- Be the entertainment: band, disc jockey, piano player, comedian. Get members of your class together and plan a skit or song.
- Sponsor a page, section, or business card in the Program Book. Various sizes of ads will be available.
- Ask publishers, drug reps, equipment reps, medical practices, or any business for a contribution. It's a great opportunity for businesses to reach 250-plus nurses for advertising.

Everyone who contributes will be listed in the program booklet and with a display card on his or her item(s). Contributions are tax-deductible.

The School of Nursing has already received these generous pledges:

Alex Siomko, '99 – Flower arrangements for the gala
Dr. Kay Kinsey – chair of the give-away drawing
Dr. Susan O'Brien – Nurse Caroler statue for silent auction

To provide any items, contributions, and suggestions or to volunteer on one of the committees, call Mary Beth Haas, Chairperson, at 215/951-1982, or e-mail her at haas@lasalle.edu

La Salle Neighborhood Nursing Center: Filling in the Gap

BY JON CAROULIS

There are many official-sounding, even impressive statistics, figures, and descriptions of La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center—the network of La Salle nursing students and nurses who reach out to the at-risk Philadelphia community with medical and educational services.

Consider:

- In 1999 the Center and its satellite branches provided care for more than 30,000 people.
- It has contractual arrangements with the City of Philadelphia's Department of Health to deliver primary healthcare for at-risk, minority infants, children, and women.
- Its two sites in Northwest Philadelphia provide care for a region with the largest percentage of uninsured people in the city.
- Hundreds of the most vulnerable members of the community depend on the health services offered by the Center.
- The Center was one of four university nursing clinics honored by the federal government for providing care to needy city residents. Said Dr. Claude Fox, M.D., Director of the Health Resources and Services Administration, an agency of the federal Department of Health and Human Services: "The clinics truly fill the 'healthcare gap' in Philadelphia."

Sean and Rosy Kongquee weren't thinking about those qualities last August as they rode a SEPTA bus with their three sons to the Birch Elementary School, about a mile from La Salle's main campus. What they knew was that the nursing center provided free childhood vaccinations—shots their boys need to attend school.

The Kongquee family was first in line for the shots, delivered by Mary Ann Herrmann, R.N., '97, a public health nurse who works primarily at the Hill Creek Center.

"I need you to be a big boy for me," says Herrmann, as she takes 6-year-old Jeremy Kongquee's arm. First, she wipes it with alcohol, then she unwraps a needle from its packaging.

Daniel, the eldest brother who is 8, is already done, proud that he didn't cry. Michael, who is 2, doesn't seem to know what's coming. Daniel starts to tease his baby brother about how much it's going to hurt. When Herrmann gives Michael his shots, he cries as he's injected. "You can cry if you want to," says Herrmann.

Many people, including those without accessible healthcare, can come to the center, either its main office just off Chew and Wister streets, or its satellite branches at the Hill Creek Center on Rising Sun Avenue or the YWCA on Germantown Avenue.

Yet the routine matters, such as school shots, are also important reasons to visit the Center.

Dedicated nurses at La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center's three sites keep things running smoothly. (Opposite page) Melanie Gavin, R.N., a public health nurse, was crucial in developing the satellite branch at Hill Creek. (Above, clockwise from top left) Eileen Villano, R.N., treats a homeless man suffering from foot problems. Mary Ann Herrmann, '97, R.N., prepares to give 6-year-old Jeremy Kongquee his school shots while Jeremy's father, Sean, looks on. Herrmann advises another parent on which shots her child will need. Public health nurse Latrina Geyer, '99, R.N. (holding the measuring cup), shares tips with Hill Creek residents on how to cook nutritious meals.

"We promote public health and preventive healthcare," says Dr. Kay Kinsey, the Center's director. "We really believe the hospital ER is not where people should be for their primary care, and we're first in the line of defense in preventing chronic illness."

The center started 10 years ago when neighbors and community groups around the University asked the School of Nursing for a "permanent" public health facility.

"It evolved from student and faculty community health projects in the immediate neighborhood," said Kinsey. "The neighborhood didn't want (those efforts) to stop when students went away for the summer." A local Bible College donated space for the center's first site. Later, with grants from the March of Dimes and the City of Philadelphia, the Center was able to create its current site at Wister and Chew streets. A few years later, Kinsey and her staff received a William Penn Foundation grant to renovate space at the YWCA; then in 1996, Dorphine Haywood, president of the tenant council of the Hill Creek Housing Complex, said residents there had to visit emergency rooms or doctors' clinics miles away to get basic healthcare. She asked Kinsey if the University could open a satellite at Hill Creek, part of the Philadelphia Housing Authority, and would only take yes for an answer. Together they obtained funding for this site.

Today, the three sites employ about 30 full-time public health nurses and staff, and 10 part-time employees. What's remarkable about the Center's growth is that Kinsey has managed to accomplish it primarily through grants from government agencies, private foundations, healthcare corporations, or anyone willing to help out.

Currently 15 grants fund services and activities at the Center, including a 1999 SmithKline Beecham Community Health Impact Award for $40,000. (La Salle was one of only 10 grantees in the Philadelphia area to receive one.)

In addition to the full- and part-time staff, all undergraduate nursing students are rotated to one or more of the sites for "clinical laboratory" primary healthcare experiences. Many graduate students also do a lab there, as do students from other nearby nursing schools. Through these experiences, the students get hands-on experience with patients with diverse needs, and they get a first-hand look at dealing with medically underserved populations.

"We want students to look beyond and see the potential of people to help themselves, to develop the skills to educate and work with people and families beyond the immediate illness," said Kinsey. "Students need to appreciate the whole picture. For example, a student might be caring for a dialysis patient but now has the insight and skills to promote preventive healthcare to those with early chronic illness and to help prevent grave illness and dialysis treatments.

"Nurses and other healthcare providers need to remember the adage 'An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure,' " Kinsey added. "We introduce students to the vital roles and responsibilities of nurses in many settings as well as a commitment to social equality. We prepare students and graduates to be true advocates for people's health." L

Fruits from the Orchard

By Caitlin Murray

"When I was 14, I thought my father was nuts," author Nomi Eve said. "He would come home from work and lay out these big family trees on our dining room table and work on them for hours. I always thought it was very boring."

But when Eve—daughter of long-time La Salle finance professor and Director of International Studies Dr. Joshua Buch—became a writer in her 20s, her father's obsession with genealogy rubbed off.

It was then, when she was trying to write a story about her family, that she found the research irresistible. By that time, her father's family tree had blossomed into a detailed collection of four 100-page journals he had written about each branch (three of which go back 200 years and the other, to the 11th century). Eve used these memoirs as the factual basis for what would eventually become her debut novel, The Family Orchard (Knopf).

The Fruit Ripens

Published in October 2000, the 32-year-old author's first novel has received accolades from Time Magazine, The New York Times, Publishers Weekly, and New York Newsday, among others. It has been named a Book-of-the-Month Club main selection, and was nominated for the Jewish National Book Award. Eve recently completed a 26-city book tour, and is planning an extensive foreign tour including stops in England, Ireland, and the Netherlands. Her novel is selling in 12 countries.

A blend of fact and fable, this semi-autobiographical tale chronicles six generations in one family, from early 19th-century Jerusalem to present-day Boston. A fictional interpretation of her own Jewish heritage, the story is told from two points of view: that of the narrator, and that of her father.

Narrated by Eve herself, the author retells the legends first heard from her father, set in the family's orchard. Eve's fiction runs parallel to her father's historical narrative throughout the text, taking the innovative form of "My father writes…I write…."

Eve said this kind of creative structure allows her to be anchored in history, while being able to fictionalize at the same time. The truth, she said, lies somewhere in between the two voices.

When people ask how much of the family saga is fictionalized, Buch quips, "Tell me what part you like, and that's factual. Whatever you don't

Excerpt from The Family Orchard

My father writes:

Rabbi Yochanan Schine, a student of the famous Chatam Sofer, was engaged to Esther Sophie Goldner Herschell, the granddaughter of the chief rabbi of the British Empire. Esther and Yochanan were my great-great-grandparents. They immigrated to Palestine and married in 1837 in Jerusalem.

I write:

Esther was pious but in a peripheral way. She knew the mitzvot, she knew to make the Sabbath holy, but she felt that there was no real harm in putting her own creative interpretation on the old rules because certainly creativity was an essential and blessed quality of Man and it would be a sin not to use it.

like is made up. If I look good in it, then that part is true."

The Soil

"I am blessed with a father who is a storyteller. It is because of his family history work that I know so much about where I'm from and who I'm from," Eve said. "He gave me the most incredible gift he could give by allowing me to use his family stories to write. This novel is a duet I would never have been able to accomplish without him. My writing grows from the soil of his passionate research."

Buch, who recalls dragging his reluctant daughter to visit ancient family graves throughout Europe on their way home from summer vacations in Israel, is more than happy to have helped. "She used to think I was totally out of my mind. It's unbelievable now that she's picked up on this," he said.

Like father, like daughter: Nomi Eve and her father, La Salle faculty member Dr. Joshua Buch, have found fertile ground in researching the history of their ancestors.

Though he studied biology and agriculture as an undergraduate at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, has a Ph.D. in International Business from The Wharton School, and has been teaching finance at La Salle for 30 years, Buch admits that his real love is history.

"It's just fascinating to me," he said with a smile. "Let me put it this way: We don't know our future, and we barely know our present. The only thing we possibly know is our past. I believe in celebrating that past, and in honoring our ancestors to whom we owe the great lives we have in this wonderful country."

Part of a third generation to work in his family's citrus orchard in the small Israeli town of Petach Tikvah (near Tel Aviv), a young Buch came to the United States in 1962 to further his education. Since advanced business degrees were not offered in his country at the time, he moved to Philadelphia to live with an uncle while he studied. He planned on returning home after earning his doctorate.

His plans changed when he met his first wife (Eve's mother), however, and they raised a family together in Elkins Park. "And the rest, they say, is history," Buch joked.

The First Seeds

Buch can still vividly remember receiving a letter from his grandfather when he was 20 years old. In it, his grandfather explained the details of his family journey—from the Ukraine to Russia to Lithuania, and then to Palestine—during the rise of communism in the aftermath of World War I. He said he was telling his grandson this so that he would "tell future generations."

"I still have that letter," Buch, now 63, said. "How he knew that I would be the crazy man who would actually tell everyone, I don't know."

What are some of the most intriguing discoveries he's made through his research over the years?

Author to Visit

Author Nomi Eve will come to campus to discuss her new novel on Tuesday, April 3, from 12:30 to 2 p.m. The event, sponsored by Lamba Iota Tau (La Salle's English Honors Society), is free and open to the public. The Family Orchard is on sale in the University Bookstore. For more information, please contact the English Department at 215/951-1145.

Buch recalled, "My father and I found a suitcase under my grandfather's bed after he died. What a treasure. This man never threw a piece of paper away. I found correspondence from 1905 to his family in Russia while he was living in Palestine to avoid the draft. We found building receipts from Palestine with a note attached to send materials by way of 20 camels. I'm telling you, this stuff is crazy."

A Family Forest

Buch has become an expert not only on his own family legacy but on the family of his wife, Debbie, who is Irish-American.

"I know more about Ireland than my wife does," the Jewish professor said. "Her family made me an honorary Irishman since I traced their roots back to the 1770s."

While he has spent many days reading through volumes of library books to collect historical data, Buch has also relied on several helpful relatives for information.

"If you do enough digging, I believe you will find that someone else did something that you can build upon," he said. "In every family, you'll find another lunatic whose work will help to double your research." L

THEY'VE GOT

By Katherine Miller '99

For every three students who walk into Edison High School, only one leaves with a diploma. And, of the 27 percent who graduate, only 14.7 percent continue on to college. These figures are fairly consistent among the seven high schools in Philadelphia's inner city Empowerment Zone, which includes West and North Central Philly, as well as the American Street Corridor.

La Salle University students are trying to make a dent in the city's discouraging statistics.

In 1998, President Clinton recognized the state of the nation's inner-city public schools by introducing High Hopes for College, a plan that would match colleges with middle schools in low-income communities and help motivate and educate 7th and 8th graders about college. Drawing from this initiative, the GEAR-UP program was created with "high hopes" in mind.

Nearly one year ago, La Salle joined the GEAR-UP Philadelphia Network, along with eight other colleges and universities, 28 middle and high schools, and 16 community-based organizations, supported by a federal grant. La Salle's partner school is Julia De Burgos Bilingual Middle Magnet School, located at 8th and Lehigh streets.

"La Salle's heart is in the right place; we're reaching out to a population who needs us," said Bob Miedel, Director of Academic Development Programs and leader of La Salle's chapter of GEAR-UP. "This program ties in with St. John Baptist de La Salle's mission, which was to offer education to people regardless of their financial situation."

La Salle's GEAR-UP (Gaining Early Awareness and Readiness for Undergraduate Programs) consists of a one-week summer program for 7th graders, financial aid information sessions for parents, and supplemental training for middle school teachers. However, the heart of the program is the daily after-school tutoring.

Tutors like Elena Hernandez, Melissa Coleman, and Lorena Locosta—all La Salle freshmen—visit Julia De Burgos School two to four times a week to help the students with their homework. While the tutors focus on reading, math and science, they find that many of the students need moral support just as much or more than help with their studies.

HIGH HOPES

"They don't have a lot of role models, and the fact that we're minorities from that area lets them know that we know where they're coming from," Hernandez noted. "They think that if we're like them and we went to college, maybe they can too."

Tutorial coordinator Burton Sternthal noted that teaching after school hours can be a very difficult task. As the La Salle tutors face a dwindling number of students who come for tutoring, some of the students who do come would rather talk than study.

"We're trying to get the tutors into the classroom during the daytime," said Sternthal. "It's easier to keep students' attention while they're in school, and it also helps the teachers give more personal attention to the students."

However, Empowerment Zone middle schools are reporting an astounding number of discipline problems during regular school hours. During the 1997-98 school year, there were 1,237 "serious incidents" (including assault and weapons possession) and 11,394 disciplinary suspensions. These problems make it more difficult for teachers and tutors to focus on each student's academic, rather than behavioral, performance.

The La Salle tutors admit that bad behavior can become disruptive, but Coleman feels that there is an underlying problem other than misbehaving. "I think the behavior is probably a distraction from the truth, that they're embarrassed or insecure about [their performance in] school, and they don't want us to know."

With approximately one-third of Empowerment Zone high school students absent daily and high dropout rates, the tutors worry not only that the kids might not make it to college, but that they might not make it through high school.

"One of my kids was already talking about dropping out," remarked Lacosta. "I just try to give him some encouragement and tell him to keep trying."

While it's too early to determine how effective GEAR-UP has been, the tutors have heard good news from the teachers about some of their students. The students' attachment to their tutors also shows tremendous promise.

"Once you get their trust, the kids look up to you," says Hernandez. They get so attached to you that if you're not there one day, they want to know where you were. They say, 'you owe me one!' "

From La Salle to New York

Burton Sternthal's musical hits the Big Apple

By Jon Caroulis

When your spouse is a big part of your success in writing a musical titled How to Insult Your True Love, you make sure to give her the proper credit.

Burton Sternthal knows this. He also knows that if it hadn't been for his wife, Susan Ann Francis Saltiel, he might not have had a one-act musical that opened in New York City.

"She was an integral part of it," says Sternthal, who works at La Salle University as a tutorial coordinator for the Academic Discovery program. "We wrote the book for the show," he added. "I'd write a draft of the score, and she'd listen to it and I'd do several more drafts before I let anyone else listen to it."

His adaptation of an Anton Chekov farce, The Marriage Proposal, was part of the Chekov Now festival that ran at The Connelly Theatre, 220 E. 4th St., November 10-12, and 17-19.

Ten years ago Sternthal was looking for a short play in the public domain that he could adapt for a musical. He also wanted a story with only a few characters and changes in scenery and costumes. Sternthal found everything he needed in Chekov's story and wrote several songs for it. Its first incarnation was performed by the La Salle student theatre group at the Dan Rodden Theatre. (In the cast for that production was a student named John Gaffney, '90; he reprised his part in the New York version.)

Performing in the Big Apple are Burton Sternthal (at piano), Art McKenzie (white tie), Nina Fine, and John Gaffney, '90 (white shirt).

The story concerns two people in late 19th-century Russia. A hypochondriac visits his neighbor intending to propose marriage, but petty disagreements occur before he asks her, and they wind up insulting each other. "It's a lot of twists and turns," he says.

Once a week Sternthal travels to New York to study composition with Maury Yeston, who wrote the score for the musical Titanic. A classmate liked Sternthal's work and suggested he send it to Adam Melnick, the artistic director of Chekov Now. Sternthal sent him a tape of his music and heard back from Melnick almost immediately.

"I thought the music meshed well with the vaudeville sense of the Chekov text. It's a farce, an upbeat little piece, and I thought it would balance out the (other festival entries) really well," said Melnick, who added, "Burt seemed like a great person to work with."

Melnick felt Sternthal's music "had a sense of purpose; it knew what it wanted to be and it became that. It had style. I'm not used to judging musical pieces, but Burt's work was so clear."

That was in April 2000, and Sternthal and the director, Howard Berkowitz (who happened to be Sternthal's best friend in high school), have been refining the show, which has been performed by The Brick Playhouse and other troupes in Philadelphia during the past few years. Sternthal performed his score on piano for How to Insult Your True Love during its New York performances. L

Business Meets Technology: A Growing Trend

By Nica Waters

Two years ago, La Salle University's Master of Science in Computer Information Science (M.S.C.I.S.) Advisory Board suggested the need for a new and unique graduate program that would combine the strengths of both an M.B.A. and M.I.S. degree. That suggestion opened the door to La Salle's Master's of Science in Information Technology Leadership Program.

What makes the program unique is the fact that the course work is a true merging, while other programs focus primarily on either business or technology. Working from the industry approach of "Mapping IT (Information Technology) to the Mission of Business," the program was specifically created for those who are currently programmers and other technology professionals aiming to move into management positions. And for those people already at the management level, the program provides a more technical background. It will help both groups to further develop managerial, business, and communication skills.

"The program represents what we believe to be a growing trend in higher education, a trend that will attempt to synthesize—rather than differentiate—disciplinary paradigms and themes," said Louis Pellicori, Vice President of Alliance Consulting and an M.S. C.I.S. Advisory Board member.

"There is a real need for more individuals with this kind of training," added Dr. Margaret McManus, Director of the M.S. Information Technology Leadership Program. "The multidisciplinary curriculum will give a sense of knowing both sides of technology and business."

Positions for graduates could be found almost anywhere there is an IT department, including non-profit organizations, pharmaceutical companies, and government agencies.

In addition to their initial suggestions, the advisory board provided a list of key topics to the curriculum committee for development. From those discussions a proposal was born.

While a need for the program was clear, the question of interest still remained.

The answers came with an extensive marketing study, which followed state approval of the first draft of the proposal. The study included focus groups with industry insiders, an on-line survey of La Salle alumni, and a hard-copy survey distributed by the advisory board among its peers.

Dr. Margaret McManus (standing), Director of the M.S. Information Technology Leadership Program, guides a student.

The results of the research showed that there was indeed a great deal of interest. So much so that applications to the program were being submitted before the state had given its final approval for the program. That approval came this past December.

Because students will most likely be working professionals, the program will be offered in the evenings on a part-time basis at both the Main Campus in northwest Philadelphia and the Bucks County Center in Newtown.

To be awarded the degree, students must complete between 12 and 15 courses, including the Integrated Capstone taken in the final semester. This three-credit course is taken in a group setting, and gives students the opportunity to show what they learned in the core and elective courses.

"One of the great benefits of the program is meeting and networking with other professionals in the field," said McManus. Although interested students could start in January 2001, a full marketing campaign will officially launch the program this spring. L

La Salle Initiatives Going Strong with the Help of Grants

During the fall semester, La Salle University received several grants, including:

- A $54,000 grant from Agilent Technologies for instructional use in the new Integrated Science, Business, and Technology (ISBT) Program. Agilent, based in Palo Alto, Calif., donated a new liquid chromotograph to the ISBT program through its University Grants Program. The device can be used to separate chemical compounds from one another. ISBT Director Dr. Nancy Jones said students will use it in ISBT core courses dealing with the environment and living systems, as well as in upper-level courses in biotechnology and energy and natural resources.
- A three-year federal grant of nearly $1 million to the School of Nusing and the Frank J. Tornetta School of Anesthesia at Montgomery Hospital to educate certified registered nurse anesthetists (CRNAs) who will work in urban and medically underserved areas. The grants will help expand existing programs and to double the number of nurse anesthesia students by the end of the grant. La Salle started its master's degree program in nurse anesthesia in 1999.
- The University's Neighborhood Nursing Center received a $50,000 grant from the state of Pennsylvania to help children and their families obtain the medical insurance and care they need. The grant is from the Children's Health Outreach Project, a joint effort of the state departments of Health, Welfare and Insurance. The Nursing Center will use the funds to create a program called "Stepping Stones to Children's Health." It is designed to improve the health of pregnant women, families, and children through educational programs and help people make better use of existing services and organizations.
- The National Science Foundation's Computer Science, Engineering and Mathematics Scholarship Program awarded La Salle a two-year grant totaling $267,460. The grant will provide 40 scholarships totaling $3,125 for graduate and undergraduate students, plus funds for tutoring and educational experiences.
- A $20,000 grant from the Pennsylvania Department of Education to the University's Academic Discovery Program will provide funds and services for students who might benefit from additional academic assistance. The grant not only provides opportunities for La Salle students, but also creates opportunities for those who participate in a tutoring program at the Julia DeBurgos Bilingual Magnet Middle School in North Philadelphia. It will also provide funding for leadership training and workshops, as well as transportation of the tutors, throughout the school year.

A More Enlightened Lay Ministry

Betty Romett is a 65-year-old mother of six, twice widowed and remarried for the third time, to a man who has eight children of his own. Heavily involved in her parish, Romett conducts the scriptural rosary and coordinates eucharistic ministers from nine parishes to visit patients in a Lower Bucks County hospital. She has also started a men's prayer group and support groups for the parents of estranged adult children and separated, annuled, and divorced Catholics. She is a eucharistic minister and lector at her church, Our Lady of Grace.

Atop all of her commitments to her parish, Romett made time to be one of the first people to be awarded La Salle University's Certificate in Pastoral Ministry in 2000. The two-year program is designed for people who, like Romett, have some experience in lay ministry and a desire to strengthen their knowledge of theology, the Church, and ministry.

"The Holy Spirit just grabbed me, and all of us who were in the course," says Romett. "I was so energized by this course. Even when I babysat two preschoolers all day, I would go to class energized, and even stay late."

Romett's classmate, Ginny Quinlan, who is a 77-year-old eucharistic minister and lector at St. Michael the Archangel, saw the class as an opportunity to learn more about her own ministry and to allow her to accept more responsibility at her parish. "There was a real atmosphere of friendship and love," Quinlan commented. "It was a good time to take inventory of myself."

Father Frank Berna, the program's director, sees these courses as a way for people to improve themselves as volunteer ministers. "The idea is for the students to connect theological reflection with their own ministerial experience," he added.

Quinlan and Romett were also in the company of three more certificate candidates, all women from Bucks County and Northeast Philadelphia Catholic parishes: Patricia McFadden (St. Joseph the Worker), Catherine McPhillips (St. Martha), and Susan Vossler (St. Catherine of Siena).

New Fitness Center Shapes Strong Bodies and Strong Minds

By Kimberly Dugan

With the help of Independence Blue Cross, the brain isn't the only thing that gets a workout at La Salle University.

To complement its solid academic programs, La Salle recently opened a new and improved fitness center: the Independence Blue Cross Fitness Center. Along with promoting the health and welfare of the students, faculty, staff, alumni, and visitors from surrounding neighborhoods, the renovated center will facilitate recruitment and retention of students and encourage student-faculty interaction in a non-classroom setting.

"The new center is a campus highlight that will enhance our tours for prospective students," said Ray Ricci, Vice President of Enrollment Services at La Salle. "It will be well used by the student body—there has already been an increase in its use. It is a great asset to the University."

La Salle's valued partnership with Independence Blue Cross (IBC) made the newly renovated center a reality. Over 800 members of La Salle's faculty, staff, and retirees use IBC health insurance plans. Because IBC is in the business of keeping people healthy, members of La Salle's alumni invited IBC to consider a grant to renovate La Salle's fitness center. Independence Blue Cross leadership responded with a substantial gift to complete the renovations.

G. Fred DiBona, Jr., President and CEO of IBC, was the driving force behind IBC's support of the proposal. "Fred recognized the importance of this kind of facility at La Salle. He asked that we work closely with the University to make this center happen," said Christopher Cashman, Senior Vice President of Corporate and Public Affairs at IBC.

"Because the new fitness center promotes wellness and good health within the La Salle community, our support will not only help La Salle attract and retain students and faculty, but help them stay in good shape and healthy as well," said Cashman.

Since the opening of the IBC Center earlier this year, the response has been overwhelmingly positive. Ed Lawless, Director of Recreation at the IBC Center, says, "100 percent of the people love it! It is state-of-the-art."

According to Lawless, the renovations include new heating and air-conditioning systems, much larger bathrooms, new locker rooms, and new showers. A 20-foot glass front was built, and a Florida ceiling was added.

In addition to these updates, 98 percent of the equipment is new. The students deserve the credit for the equipment. "Their yearly activity fees made it possible for all kinds of new machinery, such as exercise bikes, treadmills, and steppers," said Lawless.

The center has always been heavily used, but the number of visitors has greatly increased since the renovations. The improvements help the center appeal to a wider population. "Many more women are using the facility. The new cardiovascular equipment is more reflective of their needs," said Lawless.

Senior Megan Barnett, President of the Student Government Association, agrees. "The IBC Center shows that the University was really listening to the students' needs—especially the female students. The center is much more female-friendly. Before the renovations, there wasn't much space or equipment that women could use, and the big weight machines were kind of intimidating. It appeals to everyone now—it is just a great fitness center."

Dr. Henry Bart, chair of the Geology and Environmental Science department, shows visitors how he pumps some iron.

Finding Our Roots in the Community: Students, neighbors, faculty, and staff came together to participate in La Salle's fifth annual Branch Out Day on October 7. Close to 800 volunteers served the local community by cleaning up the streets, planting flowers, painting buildings, and playing with neighborhood children. Sponsored by University Ministry and Service, Branch Out is held every year in celebration of La Salle's genuine commitment to service.

Best Seats on the House

By Jon Caroulis

Eight-year old Jack Rooney, '46, did not want the Philadelphia Athletics to sweep the 1931 World Series. He wasn't betting on the games, but he did have a financial stake in them.

Seventy years ago, the American League champion A's were to play at their home ballpark for at least two and possibly three games, if the contest went that far. The games were to be played in Philadelphia's Shibe Park, located at 20th Street and Lehigh Avenue. Directly behind the low right field wall were row homes on 20th Street, whose owners provided paying spectators with a clear view of the games from their rooftops. Rooney's family lived on that block, and if the 1931 Series went to five games, his family could sell tickets for three of them. (The A's did go to seven games, playing three at home, but ultimately losing the series to St. Louis.)

In 1929, his father, John, convinced their neighbors that instead of putting up chairs and benches and trying to undercut each other, they should build a set of bleachers and agree on a fixed price of 50 cents a seat. (The rooftops gave a better view than comparably priced tickets in the stadium.) The elder Rooney had been wily enough to get a reduced rate off the city's amusement tax when two collectors had showed up during the 1929 World Series. Rooney's neighbors had paid between $35 and $50; he thought there was probably no official regulation involved, so he told the collectors he figured out his debt was $20. They bought it.

For a boy who loved baseball, home was heaven for Rooney, who retired as a psychology professor from La Salle University. He saw games for free from the roof and got a chance to get balls from homeruns. His mother, Isobele, however, hated all the foot traffic and strangers who marched in and out of her home. "She wanted to move," he said, "but my brother and I loved it."

When it opened in 1909, Shibe Park had a right field wall 12 feet high. The three-story row homes were built around 1909, says Rooney, and his parents bought their property at 2739 North 20th Street in 1925. While his memories of those years are episodic and run into each other, one event from 1930 stands out. He recalls one man pleading with his father for a ticket, even though the bleachers were filled. "I'll pay $10!" he said, and the elder Rooney somehow squeezed him onto the roof. His son vividly remembers this man getting out of his seat and playing a game of dice behind the bleachers, oblivious to the game.

During the 1930 Series the nun teaching his class asked who wanted the A's to win that day. Everyone but Jack raised a hand. When the Sister asked him why he didn't want the home team to prevail, he said if they lost that day, the Series would be extended and his family would make more money.

After a second-place finish in 1932, owner-manager Connie Mack began selling off his star players; the team was soon in the basement. In 1935 Mack put up a 35-foot "spite fence" in right field, blocking the view from the rooftops. Rooney says his father and neighbors filed suit, claiming the fence interfered with their lifestyle, such as blocking sunlight, but Mack prevailed.

The money the family earned from the bleachers came in handy. The elder Rooney saw his salesman's salary cut in half during the Depression. In addition to selling post-season tickets, the family benefited when the A's prohibited newsreel companies from filming the series at the ballpark. The Rooneys were more accommodating. For a fee. They also sold tickets for football games, boxing matches, and political speeches at the stadium.

In one sense, Rooney had a charmed life as a boy—not everyone lived next to a baseball stadium and got to see the stars up close. "But it was a mixed bag," he said. "As a very young kid it was exciting, but it also got to be boring, especially after the A's lost the World Series and Mack sold off his best players and people became disgusted with the team. I learned at an early age that baseball was a business. And I wasn't exactly in awe of the players. Some of them lived in the neighborhood and you heard about their flaws.

"Yet I thought I was lucky to be there. I remember talking to a woman who lived on a small street in back of us. I asked her, 'What are your memories of the ballpark?' and she said she remembered waking up in morning, and even though she couldn't see the field from her home, she could see the American flag flying on the flagpole, and that gave her a good feeling. That was kind of symbolic [of being there]. When I was 5, my father took me up to the roof (in 1928) and said, 'There Jack, for the rest of your life you can say you saw Ty Cobb, Tris Speaker, and Al Simmons, three of the greatest players of all time, playing in the same outfield.' That was his legacy, if you will."

Rooney joined the Navy in 1943; by the time he left the service in 1945 his parents had sold the house. In 1954, the A's left Philadelphia, and the Phillies played the last game at Connie Mack Stadium (née Shibe Park) in 1970. A 1976 fire gutted the remains, and the facility was torn down. Today, a huge church stands on the site. But the rowhomes are still there.

A few years ago Rooney and his son were driving near his old neighborhood. His son suggested they go by and have a look at the old homestead. "I thought the homes looked very nice," Rooney said.

A Very Real Role

By Kimberly Dugan

The Nightingale Award affirms a banker's mid-life decision to become a nurse.

A career change at age 41? Most people would say that is crazy, but for Barbara Pope, '90 it was one of the best decisions she ever made.

In the midst of a career as a banker, Pope, age 41 at the time, felt she needed a change in career to meet her professional expectations. She made a life-changing decision to become a nurse.

"Nursing seemed to have all the things I wanted in a career. I am a people person and enjoy interacting with and helping others," said Pope, "I like constant change, new challenges, and new knowledge, and this seemed to do it for me."

Pope took evening classes and graduated from Chestnut Hill Hospital's School of Nursing diploma program. Looking to further her education with a bachelor's degree, Pope decided on La Salle's School of Nursing because it offered her the flexibility she needed. "They understood that nurses going for their degree completion had other obligations, so they offered courses at various times to suit the needs of the individual," she said.

Pope credits La Salle's nursing program with helping her view nursing in a broader light. "The instructors would get the class to talk about real concerns like staffing issues and nursing responsibilities. It made me realize that there was a lot more to nursing than taking a blood pressure. La Salle focuses on the very real role nurses play in the survival and quality of life of the patients in their care. Nurses don't just follow the doctor's orders, but collaborate with the doctor, make suggestions, and question decisions. They are expected to think for themselves," she said. "Today, I know that is called critical thinking, but believe me, I didn't understand that before I went to La Salle."

Pope did not stop there. After receiving her bachelor's degree, she went on to earn an M.S. degree in nursing from Widener University.

For the past five years Pope has worked as a Staff Development Instructor at Albert Einstein Medical Center. She was recently honored with the prestigious Nightingale Award, which celebrates excellence in nursing.

A non-profit organization, The Nightingale Awards of Pennsylvania originated 11 years ago to honor nurses for superior performance in the areas of patient care, research, administration, and nursing education. Pope was selected based on her dedication and diligence as a nursing professional.

"The nomination was nice, and I was very flattered when I was told I was a finalist. But when I found out I had won, I just put my hands to my face," she said, "I was truly surprised and thrilled."

At Einstein, which is a part of the Jefferson Health System, Pope coordinates and teaches courses focusing on patients who need critical care. "I am a big believer in mentoring and I have developed close relationships with nurses whom I have taught," Pope said. One young nurse Pope has influenced is her daughter, Wendi, who has followed in her mother's footsteps as a graduate of La Salle's nursing program (1998).

"After I had won, my daughter came up to me and said, 'I am so proud, not just because I am your daughter, but because I am a nurse,'" said Pope.

Autumn roundup

Football's almost there. Women's soccer is getting there. Field hockey missed by a game. Cross-country (both women and men) went over hill and dale with the best, crews cruised, and men's soccer and volleyball tried...valiantly.

Such was the state of the autumn athletic teams at La Salle University, as football played its second season in the MAAC Football League and the other teams battled with varying success in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Football

For La Salle football, it has been a case of improvement and maturity each season. From the 1-8 start in 1997, Coach Bill Manlove's troops have gone to 3-6, 4-6, and in 2000, to 7-4. Included in that 7-4 is a 4-3 in the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference (MAAC), an upgrade from 1999's mark of 3-4.

In fact, it was 4-1 until the final two games, in which the Explorers were worn out by Marist and Fairfield.

Before the Nov. 18 Senior Day game, 14 seniors, some of them veterans of the 1997 football rebirth, were honored for the part they have done in bringing the sport to a point where the seven victories represented the most ever of any Explorer 11, counting the pre-World War II teams of 1931-1941.

Brian Small

"Our expected improvement came about primarily because of leadership of the seniors, many of whom were walk-ons and transfers," Manlove said. "We're looking forward to the 2001 season. Our first recruiting class will be seniors and they'll be challenged to continue the improvement."

Among those seniors will be Brian Small, whose 869 net yards led the Explorer rushers, and John Travers, who is expected to take over the quarterback role so capably filled for several seasons by senior Mike Bramowski.

Women's Soccer

The 2000 La Salle University women's soccer team accomplished many goals.

It racked up the most victories in La Salle's 15-year history of the sport on its way to a 12-6 record. It produced numerous individual awards and it battled to early-season victories over Big East opponents Villanova and Seton Hall.

Coach Jeannine Calhoun and Assistant Coach Mike D'Adamo fielded a team that displayed some outstanding young talent to mesh with a strong group of seniors.

And just when it seemed as though they would win their way into the Atlantic 10 Conference tournament, they fell short, losing two games on a New England trip on which they needed a victory in the first one against Rhode Island to clinch the berth.

But Rhode Island and Massachusetts—the universities, not the states—were uncompromising, and as the season's high hopes vanished on snow-ridden Totman Field at UMass, there were enough positive notes to dwell on, including a 5-5 Conference record.

For Calhoun herself, there was the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year Award. Senior Tracey Spinelli was voted to the All-Atlantic 10 Conference First Team and finished her career as La Salle's fourth leading scorer (54), fourth in goals (17), and third in assists (20), all this, even though she missed half her junior season because of a leg injury, which almost ended her career prematurely.

Senior Blair Hontz and sophomore Amy Schneider made Second Team and freshman Krista Lee was voted to the All-Rookie Team.

"We had a lot to celebrate," Calhoun said. "No words I can say can express how proud I am of this team, how they came together as a team and proved they learned a lot about soccer and a lot about life and what it takes to be successful...the importance of sacrifice, commitment, discipline, and responsibility."

Men's Soccer

Freshman Tom Kenney was voted to the Atlantic 10's All-Rookie Team and Graham Walker earned All-Philadelphia Soccer 7 First Team honors as the team struggled in the face of injuries and youthful inexperience.

Track

The La Salle men's cross-country team couldn't quite repeat the Atlantic 10 Championship trip it maneuvered in 1999 but it did claim second place, 17 points off the winning score. Senior Chris Cummins, junior Tim McAteer, junior Colin Brenner, and sophomore Todd Witzleben crossed the finish line 3-4-6-9, and those places earned the quartet All-Conference berths.

Since its entrance into the Atlantic 10, the men have finished (starting in 1995), fourth, fourth, second, third, first, and second.

La Salle captured ninth place in the field of 25 in the NCAA Mid-Atlantic Meet at Penn State, with McAteer leading the way for the Explorers.

The women also fared well in their Atlantic 10 romp around Pittsburgh's Schenley Park, as junior Solomiya Login (18:19) and ToniAnn Razzi, '00 (18:26) came in 12th and 14th respectively as the fastest Explorers in the field of 101.

Their third-place finish in 2000 was one notch below their 1999 result. Other good runs were in 1998 (fourth place), 1996 (third), and third in their inaugural year of 1995.

ToniAnn Razzi

Volleyball

The volleyball team rode a roller-coaster through its season, and were off to a great start by winning its first nine matches. However, a season-ending injury to assists leader Molly Thatcher, a sophomore, dashed many hopes for a move-up in the Atlantic 10. Although a championship never materialized, seniors Kelly Daniel, Trina Allen, Kristen Darby, and Lori Beth Ryan provided leadership throughout the season to their younger teammates.

Daniel finished her career with 1,053 kills, the fourth best in La Salle history. A promising note was the play of several freshmen, including Robyn Wright, who earned Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Team honors. Another bright light has been provided during the off-season with the signing of several high school and club standouts who will join Wright; her fellow sophomores Bethany Pruetz and Ashley Macchi; and juniors Thatcher, Kristin Russo, and Caitlin Keefe.

Field Hockey

The field hockey team found itself in almost the same situation as the women's soccer team, needing a late-season victory to fight its way into the Atlantic 10 tournament, but losses at Rhode Island and Massachusetts also erased those hopes.

Senior Kelly Saxman regained First Team Atlantic 10 honors, matching her accomplishments of 1998 and 1997, a year in which she amassed Rookie of the Year and All-Championship Team honors. Junior Jami Wilus continued piling up awards, earning First Team All-Conference honors for the second consecutive season.

Saxman's 12 points gave her a career-total of 36, good for 10th best all-time for a La Salle performer. Wilus, meanwhile, will enter her senior season in 11th place with 32 points.

Goalie Julie Hope's 253 saves led the conference; the senior follows on the heels of former teammate Lindsay Block, '99, the 1999 leader.

Kelly Saxman

Crew

A second-place finish in the Varsity 4 in the Atlantic 10 fall championships in Collingswood, N.J., highlighted the fall season for the Explorer women. They came in seventh in team scoring, ahead of Duquesne and Fordham, earning points in Quad and Novice 4 as well as the Varsity 4.

In the Head of the Ohio Regatta in Pittsburgh, the women were 12th (of 29) in the Club 4 and 17th (of 25) in the Club 8. In the same regatta, the men's best was a fourth (of 10) in the Lightweight 4, while also earning sixth in the Lightweight 8 and seventh in the Youth 8.

The Passing of La Salle Basketball Legend Ken Durrett, '71

"He was the best the Big 5 ever had"...the accolades poured in when the news spread that Ken Durrett had died at age 52.

By now, the shock of the death of Ken Durrett, '71, at the age of 52 on January 7 should have worn off. But the circumstances, the timing and the irony of it all will fill the minds of many of us who knew him and the thousands who watched him perform his All-American basketball magic at La Salle more than 30 years ago.

Ken made it to almost every La Salle game—men's or women's—played at Duquesne in his hometown of Pittsburgh, and occasionally made the trip back to Philadelphia for a La Salle or Philadelphia Big 5 occasion.

In the past few years, he had coached the girls' high school team at Wilkinsburg, a Pittsburgh suburb, thus his interest in both forms of the game.

As an occasional broadcaster of La Salle basketball, I hardly had to worry about our halftime guest at those Duquesne games. We knew Ken would be there, because he loved La Salle and he loved basketball. The irony is that, on January 7 the Explorer women played at Duquesne, and had he been at the game, he no doubt would have been on La Salle radio.

He wasn't there, and it was only later that night that we heard a rumor he had died during the day. As the rumor became fact, the memories started coming back, of his great games at the Explorers' Palestra home court (19 consecutive victories during one streak) and throughout the country as La Salle vaulted back to prominence on the college basketball scene.

Scoring, rebounding, defense—he did it all and obviously provided leadership on teams that were loaded with talent. To many fans and other local basketball devotees, the 23-1 team of 1968-69 was La Salle's best, which is something when you remember that the 1952 and 1954 teams captured what were then considered national championship tournaments, and the 1990 Lionel Simmons squad hung up a record of 30-2, with 22 of those victories coming in succession.

And, as expected, when the word of his death spread, the accolades poured in...from ex-teammates, former coaches, his opponents, and opposing coaches. The words were almost the same: "He was the best the Big 5 ever had," and if you take that appraisal lightly, you haven't been following the Big 5 since it all started in 46 years ago.

Too often, a player's reputation dwells on how well he played in the pros. To those of us among his followers, there was no doubt he would have been up there with Dr. J. and others of that time and since.

Fate said no...in the form of a damaging knee injury suffered late in his senior season. Today, with modern surgery and treatment, it might not have been that big a deal, but it was then. For all intents and purposes, Ken's NBA career was over almost before it started.

He managed to fight his way through a brief career, ending up with the Philadelphia 76ers in 1975. But, pro fans and aficionados never saw the Durrett that might have been, the Durrett who captivated Big 5 crowds at the Palestra in the early days of TV, before SportsCenter and the like.

Ken Durrett would have been a highlight almost every game.

Larry Cannon, '69, was one of his teammates on that 23-1 team and was as shocked as anyone when he heard the bad news on that January night:

"Kenny was a spectacular basketball player and a wonderful human being. We were very good friends and stayed in touch over the years."

And perhaps his biggest accolade came from one of his former coaches, advisor, and friend, Tom Gola, '55, usually acknowledged as the best player in Philadelphia college basketball ever:

"Kenny was the best I've ever seen, and he was a better player than me."

Praise from the top, indeed, and who's to argue?

Bob Vetrone covered the basketball scene for 30 years as a sports writer at the Philadelphia Bulletin. He is a member of the U. S. Basketball Writers Hall of Fame and the Philadelphia Big 5 Hall of Fame. He is the Assistant Director of Athletic Communications at La Salle University.

New Trustees Dedicated to La Salle's Future

Two La Salle University alums who have a history of involvement with their alma mater, plus the head of a major civic organization whose career has shown a commitment to community building, are the three newest members of the University's Board of Trustees.

Carmen V. Romeo, '65, David T. Poiesz, '80, and Sharmain Matlock-Turner were appointed to five-year terms as board members.

"It's a great honor for me. Hopefully I'll be able to contribute something to the students," says Romeo, an accounting major who often rode a trolley from his home in Willow Grove to the campus. He now lives in Malvern, Pa. Romeo, who is President of SEI's Investment Advisory Group and a member of its Board of Directors, was recently a member of the Advisory Board of the University's School of Business Administration.

"Since the time I graduated, there have been big changes, and with change comes opportunity for students," said Romeo.

Poiesz, an economics and finance major, was graduated maxima cum laude and received an award as the top economics student that year. He took several courses with Dr. Joseph Flubacher, La Salle's legendary economics professor emeritus, and after graduation helped start a scholarship named for his former teacher. Poiesz is currently the Honorary Chairman of the Flubacher Scholarship Committee.

"La Salle made an investment in me," said Poiesz, who received a Christian Brothers' Scholarship to attend the University. "They gave me a chance when I didn't have a lot of means. Hopefully it's paid dividends over time." Poiesz is a Founding Principal of Riverock Capital Management, a technology-focused private investment partnership. Previously he was an Executive Vice President at Jennison Associates, LLC and Vice President Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc. He and his family live in Pittstown, N.J.

Matlock-Turner is President and Executive Director of the Greater Philadelphia Urban Affairs Coalition (GPUAC). Her association with the University goes back to her days as a chief of staff for the late State Senator Roxanne Jones. "We used to have many community meetings with the senator and neighborhood residents at the campus," she says. "We would call the school and ask if we could use their facilities, and they always said yes." She also worked with University officials in the Campus Boulevard Corporation, a public-private venture dedicated to developing business and educational opportunities in the city's Olney section.

"I'm interested in La Salle continuing to be a strong community partner," she said. "Institutions contribute to the growth and vitality of neighborhoods, and one of the most stable and important of institutions is that of higher learning. As a Northwest Philadelphia resident, I know how important La Salle is to our area."

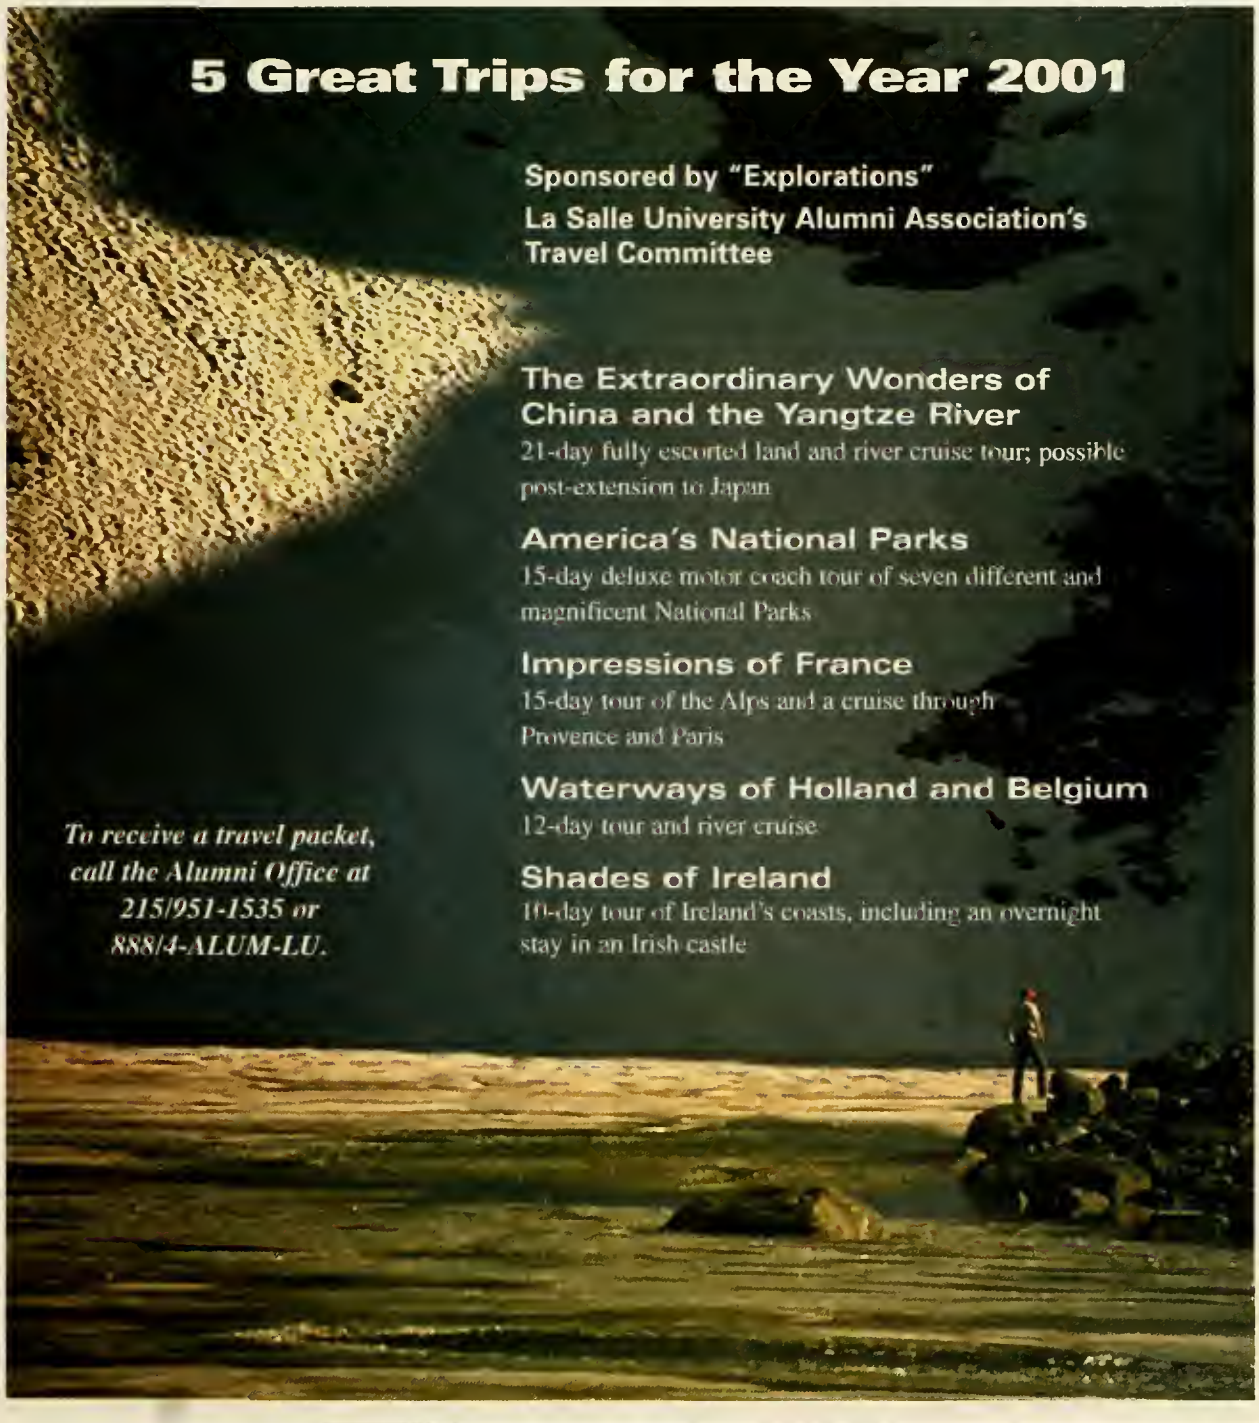
Brother Patrick Ellis Scholarship Winners Named

The Brother Patrick Ellis Alumni Scholarship Committee has announced the names of student scholarship winners for the 2000-2001 academic year. The La Salle Alumni Association raises the money for the scholarship fund, which provides money to selected students who maintain at least a 3.0 GPA, have a financial need, and are involved in extracurricular activities.

A total of $20,000 in scholarships was provided to the following recipients: François Springuel, Denise Ellis, Yury Bak, Shawn Leyden, Jeremy Peters, Alexandra Lancellotti, Craig Millard, Barbara Culberson, Sara Napoli, ShoneTae Hamilton, Jessica Thomas, and Samuel Giordano.



Parents' Weekend 2000: Teri and Charlie McClafferty, Chaircouple of the Parents' Association, along with numerous volunteers from the Parents' Association, welcomed students and their families for the 17th annual Parents' Weekend on November 10-12. Over 200 families participated in this campus-wide celebration, in which the Mummers were on hand to kick off the festivities. One of the new features of this year's event was the "Taste of Philadelphia" dinner, which included traditional Philly-style favorites such as soft pretzels, Tastykakes, and cheesesteaks.

Brother Thomas Warner, F.S.C., '41
Former Library Director

Brother Thomas Warner, F.S.C., '41, who served as Library Director at La Salle University for 38 years and was one of the longest-serving administrators in the school's history, died December 21 of leukemia at the Villa Rosa Nursing Home in Mitchellville, Md. He was 81.

Br. Thomas arrived at La Salle in 1942 as Assistant Library Director and became director in 1946. When he took over the position, there were about 14,000 volumes in the library. When he retired in 1984, there were more than 300,000.

A native of Woodbury, N.J., he joined the Order of the Christian Brothers in 1935. He earned a B.A. in English from La Salle and a master's in library science from Drexel University in 1944. He taught at West Philadelphia Catholic High School and was librarian at La Salle High School and St. John's College High School in Washington, D.C. After retiring as Library Director, Br. Thomas became the archivist for the University and the Baltimore Province of the Christian Brothers until 1993. He continued to live at the Brothers' residence on campus until 1999.

"I learned a heck of a lot from him. Br. Thomas taught me the nuts and bolts details of the archive profession better than some of my courses at the graduate school level," said Brother Joseph Grabenstein, F.S.C., '72, who was assistant archivist at La Salle until succeeding Br. Thomas. "He pioneered the archives and virtually shepherded it in its early days for the school and province. He initiated various levels of professionalism."

During Br. Thomas' tenure the University's library grew from essentially two classrooms in one building, to the David Leo Lawrence Memorial Library (now the school's Lawrence Administration Building). Br. Joseph recalled that Br. Thomas was heavily involved with the design of the Lawrence Library, which opened in 1952. It was one of the nation's first collegiate libraries with a "modular" design. There were a minimal number of permanent walls inside that allowed for flexibility in usage.

"That was a concept ahead of its time," said Br. Joseph. "He was very proud of that. He'd mention that about twice a year." Even after his retirement, Br. Thomas was involved with the design and planning of the school's Connolly Library, a $12 million facility located on 20th Street; it opened in 1987.

Burial was December 28 at the Christian Brothers' cemetery in Amendale, MD. Br. Thomas is survived by a sister, Sister Theresa Warner.

Presiding over Pennsylvania's Pot of Gold

One La Salle grad, an accountant and C.P.A., holds the key to thousands of Pennsylvanians' dreams. As the Executive Director of the Pennsylvania Lottery, Robert Mars III, '65 was there when the famed "oversized check" for $18 million was presented to Jonathan and Wendy Ohlsen in December. Being there when dreams come true is all part of the job description for Mars.

Mars has been heading the Lottery since being appointed by Governor Tom Ridge on June 13, 2000. Leaving behind his own financial consulting firm, Mars joined the non-profit lottery with the hopes of making positive changes in a lot of lives, and not just for the lottery winners.

Mars says it's exciting to hold the purse strings, but not as exciting as actually winning. "We give away half of our money in prizes, and 40 percent to seniors' programs," says Mars. PACE (Pharmeceutical Assistance Contract for the Elderly) and Shared Ride/Free Ride, which offers free or reduced-rate fares for transportation to senior citizens, are among the kinds of programs that benefit from the lottery's proceeds.

The lottery also funds 52 area agencies across Pennsylvania, including the Hot Meals Program and Home-Delivered Meals.

All in the Family

It's an old-fashioned love story. Boy meets girl at a dance, he takes her to the prom, and over 40 years later, they're still together. Even though Len Smith, '55, and his wife, Lois, have been married for 44 years, he takes nothing for granted. He still talks about her with the love and romance of newlyweds.

He likes to recall Lois's 63rd birthday party, this past September. "She was really glowing. That's when I started to think about how great our family is, how lucky we are." When he heard of the "Family of the Year" award from the Family Service Association, he didn't just see a way to recognize their 10 children. "I saw a way to honor my wife," he said.

"The letter Len sent us was well-written and eloquent; it stood out," said Nancy McKinney of the Family Service Association, a not-for-profit United Way agency offering services to people of all ages. McKinney was impressed by the entire family's activity in the community, specifically Len's many years of teaching government and coaching track; Lois's involvement with her children's schools and the Girl Scouts and Boy Scouts; and all of the children's activities, including varsity and college track.

Lois Smith, who has been suffering from kidney failure, was able to make it to the ceremony on November 16 to celebrate with her husband, children, and grandchildren. "Lois has been in good spirits since," reports Len.

ment. Howard F. Campbell Ph.D. has been appointed Assistant Superintendent for Athletics and Academic Compliance for the Richland County School District.

1995 | Brian M. Marriott recently joined the law firm of Rawle & Henderson LLP. Marriage: Allyson Miller to Rodney Jefferson (B.A. '96). John T. Boyden graduated with a bachelor's degree in theology magna cum laude from Rome's Angelicum. He is continuing his studies there for a licentiate in canon law. John O'Farrell earned a Master of Public Policy degree from Georgetown University. He recently worked for presidential candidate George W. Bush in Texas as National Volunteer Coordinator.

1996 | Marriage: Rodney Jefferson to Allyson Miller (B.A. '95).
Alfred Christopher Dezzi has been named to the board of the Philadelphia International Airport by Mayor John F. Street.

Attend ACCESS 2001 on April 5 for Career Success

La Salle University's Career Services and Alumni Relations Offices invite recent graduates to an evening of career opportunities and networking on April 5. This event is targeted at alumni who have been out of college at least two years and are currently seeking new career challenges. Employers from various industries seeking different types of individuals with different expertise will be attending this unique event.

ACCESS 2001 is scheduled for 5-9 p.m. Candidates will be able to meet with recruiters who have job openings, attend special career seminars, and discover how others are climbing the ladder of success.

For more information about ACCESS 2001, call Lou Lamorte, director, career services, 215/951-1075 or visit the ACCESS web site: www.accessalumni.org

ACCESS 2001 is sponsored by PACNet (Philadelphia Alumni Career Network), a consortium of the alumni and career services offices of 13 local universities: Beaver College, Cabrini College, Chestnut Hill College, Holy Family College, Immaculata College, La Salle University, Neumann College, Penn State-Great Valley, St. Joseph's University, Ursinus College, Villanova University, West Chester University, and Widener University.

Practicing What We Believe

Lasallian Values:

Service and Social Justice

This issue of your alumni magazine is focused on community service and service-learning. Depending on when you graduated and what you do now, you may or may not be familiar with the second term. This issue will clear that up, will bring you up-to-date on the face of service at your alma mater, and will give you a glance at the national higher education scene related to service. I will end with an invitation to you.

As alumni you know that when the Christian Brothers planted roots in Philadelphia in 1863, they came with the concept that education included service. Their Quaker brethren agreed that education also meant working for social justice. European-born and decidedly understated, both groups were and remain committed to this idea. The concept has waxed and waned in this country since its inception. Today higher education is once again awash in community service and service-learning, and all the better for it.

At La Salle, mergers and re-mergers have produced changes that we want to share with you. The university announced the Office of University Ministry and Service as part of the reorganization of the Division of Student Affairs. The six professionals who staff UMAS, the two support staff, and an array of students all work together on community service, service-learning, and adult literacy. If you are looking for Campus Ministry, the Center for Community Learning, the Urban Studies Office, and/or the Office of Community Service and Learning, you will find them in their new incarnation. UMAS is designed to help the University carry out its mission of preparing students for informed service and progressive leadership in their communities. It is also called upon to support members to openly bear witness to their convictions on world peace and social justice. The efforts toward these ends are both student- and adult-driven.

Within UMAS there is support for 22 student-led community service programs, including working with children, advocating for those in need, and engaging in direct service with adults. These commitments happen weekly throughout the academic year with additional opportunities through alternative Spring Break trips as well as international service travel in the summer. Every year, during the admission process, five new Community Service Scholars (CSS) are awarded merit grants for their outstanding service prior to entering college. The scholarships are generous and distinguish La Salle's commitment to service nationally. As the Vice President for Enrollment, Ray Ricci, has said, the 20 CSS are given the charge to "seed the campus" with service. We are fortunate to have this opportunity to reward and encourage service within the student body.

The Adult Literacy Project within UMAS is an extended arm enabling 80 adults from the community to attend classes to improve literacy skills and/or prepare for the General Equivalency Diploma test. In the fall and spring, adults are enrolled in classes both on- and off-campus with an eye toward offering summer classes as well. While the current program targets individuals who want to fulfill their potential, the future may include a more comprehensive focus through family literacy.

Within the faculty there are 44 individuals, including faculty, administrators, a dean, and department chairs who have either incorporated service into their curricula or are looking at it closely. The value of mixing theory and practice has long been part of the education of students attending professional schools such as medical, nursing, social work, and law. Now, however, biology, communications, economics, education, english, religion, fine arts, mathematics, political science, psychology, and business departments are involving their students in theory and practice through service.

With impressive continuity the Lasallian mission continues but its applications are broader and more comprehensive. In this issue of La Salle Magazine, you will read the stories of students past and present who have found that the experience of service and learning has left indelible prints on their character. You will meet faculty who have changed their pedagogy in order to challenge their students to use what they learn to improve the lives of others. There are more service initiatives than can be given their due, including the National Collegiate Scholars, the Adult Student Council, the Greek organizations, Student Government, and on and on. It is impossible to be as inclusive as one would want to be to bring all of these efforts to light.

And now for the invitation. After reading this issue, we hope you will be inspired to come back to campus to share your commitments with students who are on the same journey you were on however long ago. Speak to a small group, join us for Branch Out, run a concurrent Branch Out with others wherever you may be (we're serious), join us for extended break trips, or whatever ideas you may have. We're serious.

STEWARD

We are pleased to present to our readers a sampling of what makes La Salle University a unique educational experience. In keeping with the mission of our founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle, we strive to tap each student's potential to become a fully developed human being: an informed lifelong learner, an advocate for social justice, and a steward of the community, be it worldwide or around the block.

We make community involvement an intrinsic part of student life at La Salle, whether it's part of the curriculum, clubs and social groups, or religious activities. And many of La Salle's staff and faculty live what they teach by doing their own share of volunteering. We hope this issue of the magazine will give you an overall picture of the scope of these activities. Unfortunately, we couldn't cover every effort—their number couldn't even be calculated. But you will find, in subsequent issues of the magazine, that stories of community service efforts will always be visible. We hope you agree they're the building blocks of a student's transition into a responsible and compassionate adulthood—and a big part of what makes a La Salle education so meaningful.

Regards,
Brother Charles (Chip) Echelmeier

La Salle's Nonprofit Management Development Center

So your mid-sized nonprofit organization is growing and accomplishing many of its goals, which is terrific.

But developing a strong board of directors, fundraising, strategic planning, and managing a staff have never been your operation's strongest points. You realize that you need expert assistance, but due to a limited budget, hiring professional consultants is out of the question.

What to do? Call the Nonprofit Management Development Center (NMDC), which operates under the guidance of La Salle University's School of Business Administration and provides reasonably priced programs for Delaware Valley nonprofit organizations.

The center's mission is to help nonprofit staff and board members manage their organizations so they can carry out their own missions to serve the public good. In essence, the NMDC teaches nonprofits to embrace the same managerial concepts as for-profit businesses.

The NMDC offers a smorgasbord of services for nonprofits, including workshops for staff and board members; board training sessions; a newsletter packed with nonprofit classified ads; and answers to basic management questions by phone, fax, or e-mail.

"La Salle alumni who are currently working with nonprofits or serving on nonprofit boards are welcome to contact NMDC," says Karen Simmons, NMDC Director. "And if you are interested in becoming a volunteer or a board member, we can find a nonprofit organization that suits you."

Here is a quick look at NMDC's impact.

For more information about La Salle's Nonprofit Management Development Center, call 215/951-1701.

Joe Seltzer

Managing Nicely

He's been a professor of management and organizational behavioral skills in La Salle's School of Business Administration for a quarter of a century, so it's tempting to describe Joseph Seltzer, Ph.D., as "all business."

But that's only half the story.

Seltzer complements his business side with a no-nonsense passion for volunteerism and nonprofit organizations. His theory is simple yet enchanting: Volunteering is a good experience and a fantastic way to give back to your community, wherever your community may be.

Twenty years ago, Seltzer lent his business know-how and teaching experience to La Salle's emerging Nonprofit Management Development Center. At the time, because many sources of government funding had been slashed, nonprofit organizations were in turmoil.

"To survive, nonprofits had to learn how to run more efficiently and follow a business model, and the NMDC was born out this need," he explains.

Working with La Salle professor Joseph Kane, Ph.D., one of the founders of the center, Seltzer has spent the last two decades teaching nonprofit professionals around the Delaware Valley to operate in a business mode while simultaneously continuing their mission of helping people.

Seltzer explains one of the differences he's found between training corporate and nonprofit managers: "Many of the issues are the same, but resources are much more scarce with nonprofits. When you conduct corporate trainings, the companies cover their employees' meals; nonprofit organizations can't even afford to pay for a cup of coffee."

Seltzer notes that the NMDC has a major reputation across the country and is one of only a handful of university-connected centers offering a wide variety of services to a large number of nonprofit organizations.

"The university affiliation is important because it enables us to mix theory and practice in everything. For example, during our trainings, the idea is not to tell you how to accomplish something, but to show you how to reach your goals," Seltzer explains.

Greenwich Services

Just-in-time Advice for the Stressed-Out

Lorraine Barber doesn't beat around the bush when asked about the atmosphere at Greenwich Services.

"Our staff is burned out," she says succinctly.

Located on Church Lane, virtually around the corner from La Salle University, Greenwich Services

Union in a community is a precious gem, which is why Our Lord so often recommended it to his disciples before he died. If we lose this, we lose everything. Preserve it with care, therefore, if you want your community to survive.

—De La Salle, Meditations

provides home and day services for adults and children with disabilities, including those with developmental, physical, medical, and sensory disabilities. The majority of the people whom Greenwich serves have a primary diagnosis of mental retardation and multiple other disabilities.

Because their patients' needs are constant and often overwhelming, Greenwich employees are no strangers to crises.

"When you're working with people and their health, it's always stressful," says Barber, Assistant Director of Greenwich's Community Supports Program. "You never know what each day will bring. The good part of the job, though, is that we are like a family here at Greenwich."

Earlier this year, Barber knew her "family" needed help coping with overwhelming job demands, so she began searching for some guidance.

"And look what I found, right here in the neighborhood," she says of La Salle's NMDC.

The center's staff met with Greenwich representatives and together they decided to focus on the organization's 40 supervisors, many of whom were veteran Greenwich employees who had been promoted over a period of years and needed additional support in their current managerial positions. NMDC conducted three one-day workshops at La Salle for Greenwich's supervisors, emphasizing motivational skills, stress management, and staff development.

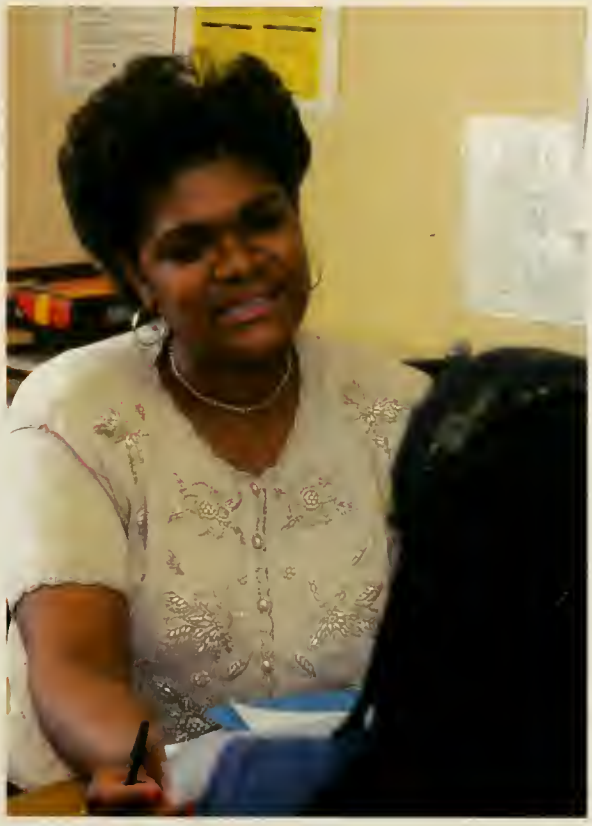
"This program was tailored to exactly what we needed," Barber says. "Instead of a generic management training program, NMDC identified our priorities and worked within our financial constraints."

Although the training was geared toward supervisors, the aim is a trickle-down effect, with managers teaching staff members what they learned at the training sessions.

"Of course, our ultimate goal in sharpening our managerial skills is to improve the quality of care we provide our patients," says Barber.

Her other goal is to continue Greenwich's La Salle connection.

"We have student internships and volunteer positions," she says, "so I hope we are just at the beginning of a long relationship with the entire La Salle community."



Greenwich Services' Lorraine Barber didn't have far to go to find help for a staff coping with many demands: She turned to a neighbor, La Salle, and its Nonprofit Management Development Center.

Beth Harper Briglia, '80

How to Make Friends and Influence People

If you think the professional résumé of Beth Harper Briglia, '80, is impressive, wait until you see her volunteer curriculum vitae.

Briglia, a certified public accountant who works for Arthur Andersen & Company as Knowledge Manager for its Financial Services Industry Mergers & Acquisitions practice, began volunteering while she was a La Salle student, continued while she worked for Arthur Andersen in Chicago, and hasn't stopped now that she is an experienced professional working in the greater Philadelphia region, a wife, and the mother of three young children.

She's not superwoman, just a person who believes that volunteerism provides a certain balance in her busy life. While there have been periods of time when she simply had to step back and take a breather from some of her nonprofit duties, Briglia consistently has donated her time and talents as a volunteer and board member to an eclectic array of organizations, embracing everything from arts to education to the environment to health and human welfare.

"There is a portion of society that remains unrecognized, and I think it's important for people to take the time to share some of the benefits they achieve with those who are less fortunate," she says.

Since 1992, Briglia has served as a senior consultant with La Salle's NMDC. As one of the center's most sought-after experts, she trains nonprofit professionals how to keep their organizations intact by improving financial management, board development, and strategic planning. She also teaches in NMDC's Advanced Certificate Program.

"Working with the NMDC provides me with a chance to share with the nonprofit sector some of the skills I developed in a corporate setting, and to give back to the community," she says.

Mixing volunteerism with her career has definitely impacted the course of her life, Briglia has discovered.

"I've developed some great relationships, both personal and professional, through volunteering," she says. "You can really expand your network of friends and acquaintances by performing this type of nonprofit work in your community.

"The nonprofit world tends to be very appreciative of volunteers," she affirms. "The psychological benefit you receive from contributing your time can be far greater than anything you'll gain in the corporate world."

If you are considering becoming a volunteer—whether you are a recent graduate or an older adult—find an organization whose mission matches your beliefs, Briglia advises. She emphasizes that volunteering should be something you want to do, not something you have to do. "Believe me, I wouldn't volunteer if I didn't have fun and enjoy what I do."

"Nonprofit organizations attempt to bridge the many gaps in our society by bringing people together, proposing alternatives, advocating for change, and implementing remedies."

Linda Lane, '89

An Active Advocate for Youngsters

When Linda Lane, '89, was growing up in North Philadelphia, she desperately wanted to become a Girl Scout, but unfortunately, there were no troops in her neighborhood.

Lane eventually made her dreams of scouting come true—and then some—by becoming a Girl Scout leader. In fact, for the past 20 years, she has led hundreds of Scouts and sold enough cartons of Girl Scout cookies to make a marketing executive drool. She teaches her Scouts to give back to the community (for example, by donating items to the needy) and helps them to see the world (after raising the necessary funds, her troop traveled to Mexico last summer; this summer, it's scheduled to embark on a two-week venture through Europe).

Lane also has been a volunteer for a laundry list of neighborhood organizations, everything from church groups to drug abuse prevention networks. But the common thread through all of her volunteer activities has been children.

"A paycheck has never made me smile or get me as hyped as much as dealing with these kids has," she says. "I need them as much as they need me, so we fill each other's void."

Her role model for down-to-earth humanitarianism was her mother. Although Lane was an only child, her mother raised a number of children for friends and family members.

"I just followed in her footsteps and always had a lot of kids around me," Lane says with a laugh.

Although her mother had limited formal education, she encouraged her daughter to pursue a degree at La Salle.

"I attended class on nights and weekends while I was married with two children," Lane recalls. "My mom was so proud when I graduated from La Salle."

Today, Lane's professional path also concentrates on young people. As Youth Opportunity Initiative Project Administrator at the West Oak Lane Community Development Corporation, she oversees 10 organizations that are dedicated to serving youngsters in neighboring vicinities.

"The Youth Opportunity Initiative Project is a very diverse nonprofit organization," Lane says. "Its programs are designed to provide kids with something to do, and they were funded specifically because there were not a lot of activities for the youth in these neighborhoods."

The programs offer an array of activities, including graphic arts, sports, performing arts, cooking, and traveling.

"We do a little bit of everything, but it's still not enough," Lane says.

To help West Oak's staff and board of directors manage as efficiently as possible, La Salle's NMDC offers training workshop scholarships.

Volunteering her time with the Girl Scouts, her church, and several other youth groups is not totally altruistic for this energetic dynamo.

"I never had a lot, but I've always had what I needed. And as long as I have that, I'll share because it always comes back triple-fold!" Lane says. "You can't pay for the type of reward you get when you do something for someone else."

WORLD OF DISCOVERY

By Nica Waters

Academic advising. Counseling. Tutoring. Mentoring. These are some of the services provided by the Academic Discovery Program (ADP), a special admissions program at La Salle University.

Geared to students whose records show that they might benefit from academic assistance, and who also demonstrate financial need, the ADP helps them develop good study habits, establish career goals, and compete successfully in an academic environment. Students accepted to the program attend a seven-week program during the summer before their freshman year, taking courses in mathematics, composition, study skills, and critical thinking. They earn college credit before their first semester.

During the academic year, ADP students take courses from the standard curriculum, but are also assigned a counselor, tutors, and an academic advisor to support them. Academic and other support programs are individually tailored according to each student's need.

Academic advising is provided by ADP staff members who assist students in planning their academic programs. Advisors direct students to tutoring in the basic skills of reading, writing, and math, as well as the more specialized areas like accounting, psychology, and economics. Counseling and referral services are also available and are provided throughout the year by an ADP counselor.

In addition to receiving their own tutoring when needed, La Salle's ADP students have an opportunity to do the same for 7th and 8th grade students at Julia DeBurgos Bilingual Middle Magnet School. Through this partnership, La Salle students motivate the DeBurgos students about college through one-on-one after-school tutoring. La Salle's ADP students are able to develop their own leadership skills as they become mentors to the middle-school students they are helping. ✹

Under Project Teamwork, student-athletes volunteer as mentors and tutors with several local schools in the Adopt-A-School program. Students at participating schools are also invited to take part in clinics and workshops and to attend La Salle athletic events. Project Teamwork is the Athletic Department's Youth Outreach and Community Service Program. For the past two years, Project Teamwork has been named to the Honor Roll for the National Consortium for Academics and Sports (NCAS) for its excellence in community service and outreach activities.

RETURNING THE FAVOR

By Kate Miller, '99

The Biondo brothers donate time and expertise to help their old high school go high-tech

Most people want to get far away from their high school after graduation. But the Biondo brothers are a different story. These two "techies" dared to return—and are now making a big difference for their high school—on-line.

Anthony Biondo, '00, who majored in Computer Science and Digital Arts and Multimedia Design, and Joe Biondo, a May 2001 graduate of the Digital Arts program, didn't forget about North Catholic High School when they entered college. Their constant contact with an old friend has inspired them to take on the immense task of creating and maintaining the North Catholic Website, www.northcatholic.com.

Brother Harry Schneider, an Oblate of St. Francis de Sales and director of North Catholic's Audio-Visual department, invested considerable well-spent time teaching Joe and Anthony the ropes in communications. In appreciation, the brothers were happy to help with the Website.

"I got a really good education there and the people who worked with us gave us opportunities and helped us grow," said Joe. "We want to use the talents they helped us develop to give back."

When Br. Schneider mentioned the high school's plan for a new Website, Anthony was interested. The plan, however, remained inactive for years. Anthony witnessed the school's struggle and offered to do the job quickly.

"In one week we had a full-blown site up for them," Anthony noted. "After that, we were free to make modifications."

Impressed? Joe and Anthony thought it could be better. They decided to conduct a live Webcast of the school's big Thanksgiving-day football game versus Frankford High School. With Anthony and North Catholic senior Chris Brower at the game and Joe at home on the computer, they managed to be the first to report the scores. "We had the final score posted within 5 seconds of the end of the game," Joe said.

The response to the new Website has been overwhelmingly positive. The site has helped the school keep in touch with alumni, while involving current students at the same time.

"North Catholic is now my homepage," said Bob McBride, a North Catholic alum. "I can get scores from all the varsity games right away. I'm really impressed with the Biondos' work."

Students enjoy posting information and even video and audio footage of events, thanks to Br. Schneider's expertise. Visitors to North Catholic's Website can read an article by a teacher, check the date of the next school dance, or leave a message in the guestbook.

Students and alumni can easily submit materials to the Webmaster via the site, and people with special access, such as teachers or administrators, can post almost directly.

"Students, faculty, and alumni can write articles or choose pictures, and the design is pre-programmed," Anthony commented. "It's a great program because the design is consistent, the site is updated faster, and it gives other people more control. Not to mention, it saves me a lot of time."

So how much does all of this free work add up to? "Anywhere from $50,000 to $500,000," said Anthony, who is Senior Web Developer for Keystone Mercy Health Plan. "We're using technology that some Fortune 500s aren't, such as wireless webaccess and a custom content management solution."

"North Catholic's site probably uses more technology than any other high school's site in the city of Philadelphia," Joe added.

GOOD NEIGHBORS

By Caitlin Murray

Exactly one week after they completed their final exams and bid farewell to the spring semester, Michelle Sheridan, '02, and 17 other La Salle University students packed their bags, dusted off their passports, and boarded an early morning flight to the Golden State. Once they landed in San Diego, they hopped in a van and began their journey south of the border.

Unlike most passengers on their plane, these travelers weren't embarking on a relaxing excursion to the beach or a resort. Instead, they were kicking off their first week of summer vacation performing hard labor in the impoverished city of Tijuana, Mexico. They were all taking part in Los Niños—Project Mexico, a new addition to the growing list of alternative spring break programs provided to the La Salle community by the Office of University Ministry and Service.

For five straight days, the volunteers mixed 50-pound bags of cement with buckets of dirt, water, and gravel under the scorching sun. They helped lay the foundations of schoolhouses, visited with abandoned children in a local orphanage, and experienced a Third-World culture first-hand.

"It was such an eye-opening experience," said Sheridan, Co-coordinator of Los Niños with Kristen Powell, '03. "Children and entire families came out to help us build schools. And the best part was that we didn't build for them, but with them. The strong sense of community there is amazing."

Sheridan, a Community Service Scholar (see page 15) who is considering returning to Tijuana to serve at an orphanage for a year after graduation, vividly remembers her experience with the abandoned children she met through Los Niños.

"We saw four children whose parents fled to the United States and left them in a cardboard box on the side of the road. One girl was only 4 months old," she said. "The more injustices I saw there, the more I wanted to help. I always feel like I have to do more to help."

Rebecca Messa, Community Service Coordinator and one of the La Salle advisers on the trip, recalled an awakening moment when they were passing through the strict border patrol on their way back into California.

"It was hot and very early. I looked out the window of our van and saw a large group of people of all ages walking back toward the city of Tijuana. They looked tired, frustrated, and worn out," Messa said. "I found out that these people were caught trying to illegally cross the border during the night. They were detained and sent back to walk home. These were old women and young boys just trying to get work and provide for their families. It's something that will keep me involved in Los Niños and other types of service for years to come."

The Umbrella of Service

Service trips such as Los Niños are just one part of the burgeoning University Ministry and Service family. With 250 volunteers this year, six professional staff, two support staff members, 22 student-led community service programs (see page 14), and a

How do you show that you possess the spirit of Christianity? Be assured that to possess it your actio three-week service trip to Hungary being planned for August 2002, the high level of commitment to service that permeates La Salle's campus is more than impressive, as is the broad scope of service covered under the umbrella of University Ministry and Service.

"We strive not only to make improvements in the lives of those around us through tutoring, mentoring, and outreach to the homeless and those inflicted with AIDS, but those in need abroad," said Louise Giugliano, Associate Director of the Office of University Ministry and Service. "From my work nationally, I have noticed only a few institutions of higher learning that made such a huge commitment to a center like ours. It is an incredible opportunity to work in a place where service is so highly regarded because it means we are preparing students for leadership and engaged citizenship. It is integral to a student's education."

Students have multiple motivations for being committed to social change and service, according to Giugliano.

"Our office brings all of those different reasons together and really reflects on the mission of our founder, St. John Baptist de La Salle, to serve the less fortunate," she said. "We recognize our responsibility to be a good neighbor and partner with the community, which is so central to the mission of this university."

How Service Has Shaped Four Students

Amanda Innes, '02

"One of the reasons I chose La Salle was because of the service that goes on here," said Amanda Innes, '02, Co-coordinator of the recently launched SAVE (Sexual Assault and Violence Ends) advocacy program and former coordinator of La Salle's Homeless Outreach. "I got the feeling that this was a group of really dedicated people and I wanted to be a part of that."

Innes remembers when she became a part of the University Ministry and Service family; it was after joining Homeless Outreach her freshman year. She was one of a team of students who traveled to Philadelphia's Center City each week to interact with homeless in the area.

"Once you make direct contact with a person, going back week after week becomes so important to you. You choose to make it a priority in your life," she said. "The people we met on the street were so excited to know that someone cared about them. It's really rewarding—especially when others see young people being committed to issues of social justice, since our generation sometimes gets a bad rap."

Innes was so inspired by the service she engaged in that the communication major switched her course of study in her sophomore year to become a sociology major/women's studies minor.

As she became even more involved in her academics and service, Innes said she noticed women's studies was an area that was lacking at the University at the time. "I felt women's issues, sexual assault, and healthy relationships were something that needed to be addressed," she said. "I knew victims of violence against women, and they needed support."

And so SAVE was born in fall 2000 due to Innes' hard work and determination. Since that time, 15 members of the advocacy group have met every week to brainstorm and plan programs on campus, such as "Take Back the Night," a rally that celebrates healthy relationships and protests dating violence.

"What our school has is really unique in terms of service," Innes said. "It's a place that allows students to look at the values and issues that are important to them and to create their own programs with guidance. There's an expectation that you do it on your own, and I think that's important."

Jim Palmieri, '02

"It's all about giving back to the community," said Jim Palmieri, '02, a Community Service Scholar and Co-cordinator of the San Miguel Middle School after-school program. "One of the reasons I chose La Salle was because of its mission of helping others. That's what makes us stand out above other schools."

Through his work at the school in Camden, N.J., Palmieri mentors at-risk students from broken homes and dysfunctional families.

"They look to us for hope—someone they can just talk to and receive help from," he said. "What makes it all worth it to me is when I see one of the students I've been assigned is improving in his or her studies. These students have a lot of problems going on at home, so it's easy for them to lose concentration and become distracted. One of my students who was doing poorly for a while is getting ready to apply to high school now. That makes me feel good."

Katie McDonald, '01

Every Monday night for the past three years, Katie McDonald, '01, went to the second-floor lounge of the Philadelphia Geriatric Center on Old York Road to visit with elderly patients. Together, they played Wheel of Fortune and Jeopardy, made arts and crafts projects, or just talked.

For the two hours that she was there every week, McDonald made a difference in the lives of sick patients who didn't have many visitors. Now that she has graduated from La Salle, ust not give the lie to the faith you profess, but rather be a lively expression of what is written in the Gospel.

—De La Salle, Meditations

Katie McDonald, '01 (left), assists a community volunteer to clean up the local neighborhood during La Salle's annual Branch Out Day.

she said she'll miss the time she spent as an Elder Care volunteer.

"They really looked forward to having us there," said McDonald, Co-coordinator and founder of La Salle's Elder Care program. "They told us all about their families and enjoyed talking with us. If we hadn't been there, they would have probably just been sitting in front of the television."

Also a Co-coordinator since sophomore year for La Salle's AIDS Outreach, McDonald, a Community Service Scholar, knows how important it is to stay in service even when schedules are tight. "You worry about school and your grades so much sometimes, and then you think, 'How do I even get wrapped up in these things when I see what these patients go through every day?'" she said.

As a student McDonald also was involved in La Salle's Pastorius and Best Buddies mentoring programs.

"I wouldn't be the person I am if I weren't involved in service," she said. "I learned more from these experiences than I ever could from a textbook. And I'd like to think I'm a better person because of it."

A biology major at La Salle, she plans to attend medical school in the fall and become a pediatrician. "When I went for my medical school interviews, they didn't want to talk about my grades," she said. "They only wanted to know about my service."

Larry Stevenson, '03

Also a Co-coordinator of Elder Care, Larry Stevenson, '03, said he can see how much his involvement in service at La Salle has transformed his thinking.

"I don't know when or where the change happened, but the service I've participated in here has helped me mature since the beginning of freshman year," said Stevenson, who is a Community Service Scholar. "I remember thinking 10 hours of service per week [required of all Community Service Scholars] was a lot to handle with all of my school work. But then I realized I'm not here to fulfill a requirement. I'm here to give myself to those in need. When you think of it that way, 10 hours doesn't seem like much at all."

For the two hours a week he spends volunteering at the Philadelphia Geriatric Center, Stevenson said he is happy to be able to use the gifts he's been given to share with others.

"I know the patients really appreciate my time, and I appreciate theirs," he said. "Sometimes I feel like we're the only ones they have to talk to."

As an elementary/special education major, Stevenson also spends two hours a week helping special needs students in the classroom as part of his field experience. One of his goals is to initiate a program through University Ministry and Service that focuses on a special needs population.

"People take for granted the need for social justice—whether it's for kids who are abused, the elderly, the homeless, or any other group," Stevenson said. "If you're able to volunteer to help someone once, you can see why it's all worthwhile. That's how I live my life now—sharing my gifts with others." ✸

"I GET A LOT FROM GIVING A LOT"

A conversation with Kirstin Shrom, '96

Kirstin Shrom, '96, formerly was Assistant Director of Alumni Relations for Reunion and Class Programs (Fall 1999-Summer 2000). She is now Program Manager of Peacework, a nonprofit volunteer organization based in Blacksburg, Va., that arranges volunteer projects and service-learning programs around the world for colleges, universities, and service organizations. She was interviewed by Caitlin Murray, assistant editor.

Q: What types of service were you involved in as a La Salle student?

A: I was involved in many types of service throughout my four years at La Salle. I would have to say the three most significant were: LOCK (La Salle Organization of Caring for Kids), Project Appalachia—which I became involved with in high school and continued throughout college—and the Chile service project [Week of Hope]. In Chile we painted houses, led a day camp for kids, and helped a community conduct a census to present to the Chilean government. The things I remember most about the trips are the partnerships and friendships we made with the people there.

Q: Do you think those experiences planted some kind of desire in you to continue to serve others after graduation?

A: Those experiences are good examples of how my interest in working with groups really took off. When I was a student Coordinator for Project Appalachia, it was the first time I was ever a leader of such a large group (40-50 people), and I loved it. All three of these experiences represent the local, national, and international aspects of service and how they impact one another. To me, that is what community is. I think that's when I began to view service as a theme in my life.

When she was a La Salle student, Kirstin Shrom, '96, led a day camp for children as part of the Chile service project.

Q: What are some of the benefits you reap through helping others?

A: When you volunteer, you step out of your own life to learn about someone else's, but you also learn about yourself and your own life at the same time. You learn about yourself as an individual and as part of a group, a system, a community—because they're all inter-connected.

Q: What sparked your interest in Peacework?

A: The service I engaged in at La Salle changed my life. I think it's always great to do short-term service, but I wanted to do something more. I thought, "This can be my life." I just had to figure out a way to do it. That's why I took the job at Peacework. What really grabbed me about the position were the international service programs the organization is involved in all around the world with so many groups—the majority of which are college-based and/or faith-based.

Over the years, La Salle students have traveled to Appalachia, Boston, Chile, Mexico, and additional locales to work with children, build schools and houses, and perform other projects as part of the service trips held annually by University Ministry and Service.

Q: In your line of work, what fulfills you in a way another job never could?

A: Being involved in service is intrinsic to who I am. What I value more than anything is people—meeting them and knowing them. That's where I get my energy. That's what I like so much about what I'm doing. I enjoy the partnerships, learning about people, caring enough to go places to help people and to take the time to know them and understand their lives. I get a lot from giving a lot (though that's not my sole purpose for doing it). Anybody who engages in service will tell you that the more you serve others, the more you actually gain.

Q: What type of service are you involved in through your position at Peacework?

A: I just returned from a service trip to Honduras, where we helped rebuild homes that were destroyed by Hurricane Mitch in 1998. Can you imagine it taking so long to rebuild homes in the United States? We worked in a community within a banana plantation where it took us close to 30 minutes to travel five miles because the dirt roads are difficult to travel. It was great because we could see how the people were encouraged just by having us there. One of our hosts told us we were all like a little piece of Jesus for them. It's not that we were viewed as "saviors," so much as our presence encouraged their faith. To know that someone cares enough to help them enriches them. It's a good feeling to know that what you're doing is helping someone.

Q: Do you have any advice for people who are interested in serving others, but feel they don't have the time?

A: I think it's all about setting priorities and finding a balance in life. Service teaches you these things. For me, I learned that being part of a community means serving one another. When you're a student or you're working in the business world, the focus is on learning and building skills to get a better job, which will eventually lead to an even better job, and so on. That's not what I want my life to be about. I want to be a better person, to build better people, to build a stronger community. ✹

A glimpse of the 22 community service programs administered through La Salle's Office of University Ministry and Service

The student organization that fosters campus-wide programming and planning of community service activities is called FOCUS. It oversees all other service programs.

Tutoring

Neighborhood Tutoring—One of the largest work-study programs in the country. Has been nationally recognized by former President Clinton

Foster Care—La Salle tutors help struggling students realize that attending college is an attainable goal

San Miguel—After-school program with at-risk students at the San Miguel Middle School in Camden, N.J.

Mentoring

LOCK (La Salle Organization of Caring for Kids)—Works with various programs including St. Christopher's Children's Hospital and St. Vincent's

Pastorius—Mentors work with pupils from Philadelphia's Pastorius Elementary School through the fifth grade

Youth Worker—Prepares children for the future by instilling in them a strong work ethic and knowledge

Best Buddies—Mentors build relationships with mentally and physically challenged teenagers

Big Brothers & Big Sisters—Mentors work with local elementary school students

Explorers at the Inn—Mentors work with middle school students at Holy Innocents Parish in Spanish and French, and run an after-school soccer program

Direct Service

Branch Out—An annual campus-wide community clean-up day

Homeless Outreach—Students interact with homeless people in Philadelphia's Center City area

Soup Kitchen—Students distribute food and provide aid to the homeless

Habitat for Humanity—Students work on Saturdays to help rehabilitate homes for those who cannot afford to do so on their own

AIDS Outreach—Volunteers visit AIDS patients at a local medical center

Elder Care—Volunteers visit elderly patients at a local geriatric center

Service Trips

Project Appalachia—Students visit the Appalachian region over Spring Break to help rebuild lives and homes

Los Niños—Students build schools, visit orphanages, and help to combat poverty in the border town of Tijuana, Mexico

Week of Hope—Students travel to a different city each year over Spring Break to provide service

Advocacy

AIDS ALIVE (Awareness at La Salle Is Vital Education)—Promotes AIDS awareness to the community

La Salle Committee to End Homelessness—Addresses issues of hunger, poverty, and homelessness

Adult Basic Education Instructor Courtney Parkins prepares students for their high school equivalency test. La Salle's Adult Learning Program, administered through University Ministry and Service, collaborates with the YMCA/Philadelphia Adult Education Network to help adult learners with basic reading, writing, and math, as well as English as a Second Language classes. The program, coordinated by Stephen D. Kopec, began in 1983.

Children who take part in La Salle's tutoring program (above) also spend a few minutes each session blowing off steam with outside activities (left).

LGBTSA (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Straight Alliance)—Promotes advocacy for equal rights, seeks to challenge all forms of discrimination

SAVE (Sexual Assault and Violence Ends)—Focuses on women's issues and healthy relationships

A REAL EDUCATION

By Jon Caroulis

One-of-a-kind Community Service Scholarships put the emphasis on education AND volunteering

Brother Charles (Chip) Echelmeier had seen dedicated students arrive at La Salle University eager and willing to get involved in community service, only to see them cut back on their volunteer work to get part-time and even full-time jobs to help pay their expenses.

But what if the students could get scholarships or financial assistance? Then they wouldn't need to work.

"The idea was to provide them with support to continue their community service at La Salle," says Br. Chip, Director of the Office of University Ministry and Service. "Since we've made the Community Service Scholarships permanent, we've seen some remarkable students come through the program.

"It reflects the mission of the University—of having a healthy relationship with the community where we live," he added.

While there are many foundations and corporations that provide scholarships to college students who perform community service, La Salle is the only university that provides such financial assistance. "It wasn't patterned after anyone else's," says Br. Chip. Each year five students are selected.

This past March, the Office of University Ministry and Service received 101 applications. Br. Chip and Louise C. Giugliano, Associate Director of the office, said from that pool, about 60 were given serious consideration by the scholarship committee, and 10 applicants were invited for interviews.

Once selected, students are required to perform 10 hours per week of supervised community service, although many contribute more than that.

And whether it's intended or not, it's been a learning experience for some of the students.

Jim Palmieri, '02, grew up in suburban Philadelphia, and in his family, volunteer work was ingrained. His mom gave many hours to the Red Cross; sometimes she'd take Jim and his siblings along with her to help out. Later, she was employed by the agency, and Jim enrolled in an after-school AIDS education program.

But it wasn't until he got to La Salle—and even more importantly until he got off campus to Camden, N.J.—that he really understood what community service could mean.

Palmieri began working with students at the San Miguel Middle School in Camden, N.J., a school established by the Christian Brothers that educates some of the poorest, most disenfranchised children in the state.

"I grew up in a home where it was expected that I'd go to college," he says. "That was a given. For these kids, graduating high school is a huge step—only about 50 percent even finish that. They look at me and say, 'You think I can go to college?' You realize that not everyone has the same advantages you had and that you really can make a difference in someone's life, as clichéd as that sounds. But it's true."

A finance major, Palmieri is anything but low key: He gets enthusiastic, even excited, talking about his community service work. But he's learned what he wants to do with his life aside from a business career. "I'd like to be an investment banker," he says, "but no matter what I do, at some point, I'm going to work with a nonprofit agency, maybe as a board member, and contribute what I know. It could be about finances, or management, but I'll definitely use what I'll learn and give that back."

Before coming to La Salle, Christina Kozen, '01, a finance and Management Information Systems (MIS) major, worked as a volunteer with the Philadelphia Archdiocese coordinating an outreach program for the homeless. As she was about to graduate from the University after completing four years as a Community Service Scholar, she reflected on what she gained from the program:

"One of the major things I got out of being a Community Service Scholar was the realization of the way society is right now. It's helped keep me realistic," said Kozen. "It made me aware of social justice and how social programs can be an educational tool in making life better for others."

HOUSE CALLS

Nursing students reach out close to campus through the La Salle Neighborhood Nursing Center

Most mothers will tell you there are many concerns during the first year of a baby's life. Although they call their doctors with questions in between visits, they would rather have someone actually see their child and alleviate their concerns. Sara Eldridge, Public Health Nurse for La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center, does just that for Katrina Douglas and a host of other clients she visits on a regular basis.

Eldridge, who is enrolled in the Graduate Nursing Program at La Salle, conducts follow-up home visits as part of the Health Intervention Program for Families (H.I.P. for Families) implemented by the Neighborhood Nursing Center and funded by the Title V funds through the Philadelphia Department of Public Health. The visits, which occur once a month or more frequently if needed, continue throughout the first year of a child's life.

It is an invaluable service for Douglas, a young mother of three. Eldridge visits her home to check on KaRon, Douglas' 9-month-old son. "I love it," said Douglas. "It keeps me updated on his growth and development and allows me to ask questions. I don't have to wait until my next doctor's appointment for someone to see him. They also provide all kinds of support services from transportation to housing referrals."

Most of the clients in the program have been referred by pediatric social workers, but a family member referred Douglas. "My aunt used to work near the Neighborhood Nursing Center and she told me about all of the help I could get," said Douglas.

With 5-year-old Imani in school, 3-year-old Eboni looks on as Eldridge takes KaRon and puts him on the scale and measures both the baby's body and head. Eldridge calms Douglas' concerns regarding the baby's weight and eating habits. As little Eboni spills yogurt on Douglas' new couch, the conversation turns to day care concerns because Douglas is looking to return to work.

Sara Eldridge (left), a Public Health Nurse and La Salle graduate student in nursing, discusses with Katrina Douglas how to care for her infant son, KaRon. Eldridge pays monthly visits to the Douglas home as part of the Health Intervention Program for Families run by La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center.

Eldridge also provides Douglas with information that can help her two older children. For example, she has put Douglas in contact with a representative from the Germantown Family Center to discuss enrolling Eboni in Head Start, a program that helps younger children prepare for starting school.

Douglas does not know what she would have done without H.I.P. for Families. "It's really helped me out. I would recommend it to anyone having a baby. I already have someone I am going to refer," said Douglas.

The program was designed to assist "at-risk" mothers with their childcare. The term "at-risk" can be applied to mothers who did not receive adequate pre-natal care, or those who have had multiple pregnancies in a short amount of time and need extra help. In addition, the program is geared toward teen mothers, substance abusers, and those with a low financial status, as well as a variety of other social problems. The program provides for the assessment of health and development, and offers support services such as free tokens for transportation to the doctor's office and connecting mothers to W.I.C. and other community resources.

The client is not the only one who benefits from the home visit: "Being a public health nurse fulfills a lot of my professional dreams. I get to meet clients in their homes and educate them. I am able to intervene when I see a problem or the client needs help," Eldridge said. "I can make a difference and it is very rewarding and satisfying."

LEARNING, UP CLOSE AND PERSONAL

By Jon Caroulis

La Salle graduate psychology students peer through a one-way mirror to watch a counseling session in action at La Salle's Good Shepherd Center.

OK kid, you're on your own....At some point, almost every career starts off this way. The classroom lectures, the hours studying, the watching and observing—it all boils down to when you do something for real.

For Andrew Arthur, a La Salle graduate student in psychology, that moment came when he found himself counseling his first client as a therapist, and the woman was contemplating suicide.

As part of his training, Arthur and other students had spent hours watching others counsel clients—many of whom live in the community surrounding La Salle. They had watched videotapes, even sessions through a two-way mirror (all clients sign a release form and know they are part of the students' learning process). But now Arthur was on his own.

After a few sessions, Arthur learned that the client was using the idea of suicide as a way to attract attention.

Both patient and therapist gained something. "I learned that I had made the right choice, that I was in the field I wanted to be in," he says.

Learning while helping others—or service learning, as it's called in higher education circles—is that rare combination of idealism and practicality. Students might leave college not knowing if they'll change the world, but they can, and often do, make a difference.

La Salle's social work majors, for instance, must perform internships with a social service agency in their junior and senior years. In a Management Information Systems course, students are mentoring local high school students not only to help them with computers, but to study the "digital divide" that exits between affluent and poorer communities. Nursing students work in a number of community settings where they get to practice what they've learned at La Salle.

"Classes are important, but being in the field gives you a perspective you can't get elsewhere," says Jessie Vega, a senior social work major. "Then I can go back to my professors and talk about it." This past year she's worked with a local organization that helps with adoptions.

Vega's first professional experiences were "scary," she said, but as time went on she became more confident. She, too, says the experience reinforced her career path.

And service learning doesn't have to be in a field with a "helping" tradition.

"I have made a commitment in the last seven or eight years to partner with a nonprofit group in the area," said Lynn Texter, professor of communication. "Selecting a local organization has the dual purpose of enabling students to gain experience as well as helping out a worthwhile establishment that needs assistance."

Texter's students worked on a marketing campaign with the local chapter of "Gilda's Club," an organization that provides home-like settings for cancer support groups. The local affiliate was so impressed with their work that it asked students to present their plan to the organization's national chapter. This year her classes are working with the Animal Humane Sanctuary in Delaware.

Two years ago, Mike Smith, a Communication professor, had students work with officials at Pastorius Elementary School near La Salle to get these pupils excited about doing well on standardized tests. The school had finished 10th out of 11 in its cluster. In addition to offering homework workshops and study groups, the La Salle students organized a pep rally and obtained media coverage to help motivate the pupils. The school jumped to second place in its cluster. Smith's students continue to work with Pastorius.

Katie Wilson, '01, who majored in social work, did an internship at Frankford Group Ministry, working with juveniles in after-school programs; many of the students are in the program by a court order or need supervision.

This past semester Wilson was counseling one of the students whose father had died. "I had taken grief and loss class, and all the things we had been going over in class, all those elements, I could use in the counseling session with him, and it just hit me: I was finally able to use what I learned in the classroom. It was very empowering, very useful."

THE ROOTS OF "BRANCH OUT"

By Kate Miller '99

The students in Mr. Clark's class at Archbishop Ryan High School in Philadelphia are being encouraged to speak up. Just as boisterous as any other set of American teenagers, they don't need to be any louder in Mr. Clark's classroom, but rather outside.

"I want them to get involved, and to be heard," he says. "We talk about poverty, racism, sexism, and political activism in class, but these things are just as much or more relevant outside the classroom."

Lew Clark, '98, who now is pursuing a master's in Theology at La Salle, is not just a hero to his Ryan H.S. kids, but a La Salle legend as well. In the same way the kids look up to him for a way to get involved in community service, the entire La Salle campus looked to him for a chance to make a difference in the neighborhood.

In 1996, when Clark proposed a new community service program called Branch Out, he was trying to find a way to get as many people as possible helping out on the same day.

Lew Clark (right) explains the day's events at the first Branch Out in 1996.

Clark's theory was simple: "People want to get involved in the community," he said, "but they don't know where to start, and their schedules don't allow them to commit on a weekly basis. So, if you give them an opportunity and make it convenient, they'll do it. They just need to be asked."

Clark (left) helps out at the annual Kids Carnival, held at La Salle on Branch Out Day.

It seemed the success of Branch Out was just for the asking. By the registration deadline, Clark had beat his goal of 160 participants by more than three times...approximately 500 participants had signed up. The next year, there were 1,000.

"The special thing about Branch Out is that each person can do something tailored to their special talents or interests," Clark added. Whether it's environmental, or working with children, or making a videotape of the event, everybody can do something they're good at."

University Ministry and Service has also received a lot of positive feedback about Branch Out. "They like seeing all of those La Salle T- shirts lining Germantown avenue," Clark laughs.

Despite the program's name, Clark pointed out that it's not about sending representatives out into the community, but inviting the neighbors in. The Kids Carnival, for example, treats nearby elementary schools to a day of games, arts and crafts, and sports on campus.

"The message is that La Salle is a good neighbor," said Clark. "It says that we're committed to improving our community."

E-Commerce Gets Boost from Kemper Foundation

The James S. Kemper Foundation of Illinois has given La Salle University's E-Commerce Institute a three-year $125,000 grant to further develop the internship and corporate mentoring components of its Student Fellows Program.

La Salle's E-Commerce Institute is open to all full-time undergraduate students, M.B.A. and E-Commerce certificate students desiring a working knowledge of this field. Institute leaders plan to use the grant to take student involvement in the e-business community to a much higher level, with supervised internships and corporate partnership programs.

The Students Fellows build a portfolio of e-commerce studies, research, and work experience. Students must complete either approved courses that deal with e-commerce, or attend several lectures by industry experts. Also required are a research paper, which can be assigned from any course, and 40 hours of professional activity related to e-commerce, which can include a co-op experience or internship, consulting to a business on e-commerce matters. It is this final part of the requirements that Brazina hopes to enhance and expand with the Kemper Foundation grant.

Some of La Salle's brightest and most talented students were honored at the 27th annual Student Award Reception on March 21. Front row, from left: Megan H. Barnett, James A. Finnegan Memorial Award (given for Judeo-Christian Ideals of Social Justice); Muriel E. Robinson (evening division), James J. Finnegan Award (for leadership); Genevieve A. Pawela, Dr. Victor D. Ottley, International Student Award (academic excellence and service); and Jen Zenszer, Female Scholar Athlete. Back row, from left: Allan J. Medwick, John J. McShain Award (given for public welfare); Marianne Bellesorte, Brother Emery C. Mollenhauer Award (given for Commitment to Service, Peace, and Justice); Henry C. Franz, Jr. , Joseph F. Flubacher Award (given for outstanding leadership); Kevin Campbell, Male Scholar Athlete; and Provost Richard Nigro.

The School of Business Administration recently hosted a reception honoring George R. Swoyer (right), who enjoyed 44 years as a marketing professor at La Salle. His legacy of teaching will forever be remembered through the generosity of the many marketing alumni whose contributions have provided for the newly refurbished George R. Swoyer Learning Center in College Hall.

ISBT Program Receives a Challenge Grant to Support Student Entrepreneurs

La Salle University's Integrated Science, Business and Technology Program (ISBT) has received a $100,000 commitment as part of Ben Franklin Technology Partners Young Entrepreneurs Challenge Fund Program. This program will provide seed funding to La Salle high-tech students who have business concepts that require feasibility studies and start-up support.

This commitment requires that the University raise $100,000 in matching funds from its alumni. Student projects will be supported on a 50-50 basis from both funds. La Salle graduates who have founded and managed their own business ventures will be invited to serve as mentors, advising students in all facets of entrepreneurship.

"The Ben Franklin Technology Partners is pleased to participate in the Young Entrepeneurs Challenge Fund as part of our commitment to promote entrepreneurship in the region by investing in tomorrow's business leaders," noted RoseAnn B. Rosenthal, President and CEO of Ben Franklin Technology Partners of Southeastern Pennsylvania.

While entrepreneurship is not a requirement for ISBT students, much of what they will study will lend itself to entrepreneurial ventures. Students will be encouraged to think in terms of starting their own high-tech endeavors by using the technical and business knowledge and problem-solving skills learned in their ISBT courses. Marsha Wender Timmerman, an ISBT faculty member, said, "ISBT graduates will have the skills and knowledge to make good business decisions and to understand what is necessary to start a business and make it profitable."

With support from the Coleman Foundation, Inc., Timmerman is developing a year-long course called Entrepreneurship and High-Tech Business, in which "we will show science and technology students how to be effective entrepreneurs." This course will be offered in fall 2001. "Too often, people with technical backgrounds lack the skills and training to take their ideas to the marketplace," said Timmerman, who was co-founder and president of a biotechnology firm before coming to La Salle. "Scientists have many good ideas for products but do not know how to develop an idea into a profitable product," she said.

"The ISBT curriculum was designed so that the study of science, technology, business, mathematics, and the liberal arts are integrated to enable students to arrive at scientifically and economically informed solutions to real-world problems," said ISBT Director Dr. Nancy Jones. "People in business are going to need to think in all areas—science must be combined with marketing, cost accounting, and human resource skills to effectively take laboratory discoveries to the marketplace," Jones said.

Ben Franklin Technology Partners Young Entrepreneurs Challenge Fund will be administered through a partnership of the Ben Franklin Technology Partners and those colleges and universities in the region that are interested in participating. The entrepreneurs will be obligated to repay the investment if their business ventures are successful, thereby creating a revolving fund.

Ben Franklin Technology Partners is a statewide network that fosters innovation to stimulate Pennsylvania's economic growth and prosperity. With support from the Pennsylvania Department of Community and Economic Development, the Ben Franklin Technology Partnership operates regionally with four centers strategically located throughout the Commonwealth. Ben Franklin Technology Partners brings together the best of Pennsylvania's people, ideas, and technology to serve as a catalyst for advancing the state's knowledge-based economy.

Gwynedd-Mercy College in Montgomery County, Pa., and La Salle University signed an agreement on March 23 to feature La Salle's M.B.A. degree program on Gwynedd-Mercy's campus, beginning in the fall 2001 semester. By offering classes at Gwynedd-Mercy, La Salle will reach working adults living or working in the Montgomery County area who wish to obtain an M.B.A. degree. Signing the agreement are La Salle's President, Brother Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., Ph.D., '71, and Gwynedd-Mercy's President, Sister Linda Bevilacqua, O.P., Ph.D.

Newly Beatified Brothers

Five Brother Martyrs from Spain were beatified in Rome on March 11, 2001, along with a group of 226 Spanish Martyrs from the Civil War in Spain.

They are Brothers Honorato Andrés, Florencio Martín, Ambrosio León, Bertrán Francisco, and Elías Julián. These five Brothers were from Teruel and belonged to the District of Barcelona, which at that time included what is now the District of Valencia.

Three of the Brothers, from the Bonanova community, were martyred on October 22, 1936, as they were attempting to reach Aragon. They had to stop as they passed through Valencia. There, motivated by their apostolic zeal, they wanted to continue their educational ministry. This led to their being found out as religious, and they were assassinated the same day as their arrest.

The other two Brothers, from the Cambrils community, had to vacate the house of formation and accompany a group of novices and scholastics from Aragon. As they stopped in Valencia, they were identified as religious and assassinated on November 22, 1936. The ages of these men are a striking aspect: 28, 23, 22, 23, and 35 respectively.

La Salle Celebrates

Commencement 2001

The sky was bright blue, the graduates were beaming, and the stands in McCarthy Field were packed with proud family and friends on Sunday, May 13, at La Salle University's 138th Commencement ceremony.

Julie Pauzano, a sociology major, was chosen by her fellow graduates to give the Commencement speech.

About 984 day undergraduates, evening and weekend undergraduates, and graduate students received their diplomas during the event, but not before hearing an inspiring speech from a fellow student and witnessing several major award presentations.

The Commencement speech at La Salle is traditionally given by a graduating senior. This year's speech was made by Julie Pauzano, a sociology major from Lansdale, Pa. She was selected by committee to present her speech after competing against four other finalists from the senior class. Pauzano chose to talk about her positive and life-changing collegiate experience as a way to come to terms with the closing of an important chapter in her life.

Two leaders in Catholic education and service, the Most Rev. Nicholas DiMarzio, Bishop of Camden, and Brother Alvaro Rodriguez Echeverria, F.S.C., Superior General of the Christian Brothers, received honorary Doctor of Humane Letters degrees from La Salle during the ceremony.

Bishop DiMarzio has an extensive background in migration and refugee services. He has served as the first Vicar for Human Services of the Archdiocese of Newark, where he had the responsibility for human service needs in housing policy, pastoral and professional substance abuse programs, and AIDS ministry.

Serving as Executive Director of Migration and Refugee Services of the U.S. Catholic Conference, DiMarzio coordinated the resettlement of 30,000 refugees per year; the provision of immigration services to more 10,000 clients; and pastoral care for newcomers to the United States. He worked to develop a network of affiliates to coordinate legalization efforts on behalf of more than one million undocumented aliens.

Brother Alvaro became the Superior General of the Order of the Christian Brothers on June 2, 2000, the 26th leader of the order founded in the 17th century by St. John Baptist de La Salle, the patron saint of teachers in the Roman Catholic Church. Today, the Order educates more than one million students in more than 1,000 schools and colleges in 72 nations.

In the 1970s and 1980s, Brother Alvaro worked in Guatemala and Nicaragua during a dangerous period when there was, in effect, an undeclared war between the notorious death squads and the ordinary people, resulting in thousands of deaths. As a teacher, Director of a Brothers school, and Provincial of the District of Central America, Brother Alvaro personally experienced the violence and the underlying tensions of these difficult years for the Brothers, their students, and families.

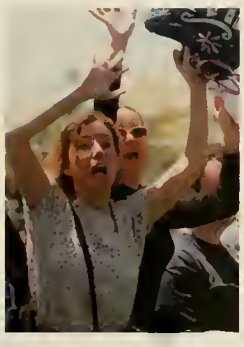
Following the conferral of honorary degrees came the presentation of the Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching, which is made possible by a generous grant from the Lindback Foundation. This year's award went to Dr. Gerald Ballough, associate professor of biology, who is an outstanding researcher and has an extensive body of professional work.

Ballough was honored for his enthusiasm for his subject matter, his ability to bring that subject to life, and for going above and beyond for his students.

In honor of his outstanding contributions to the community and the field of higher education, Michael J. Emmi, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of SCT, received the La Salle University Leadership Award at the University's ninth annual Charter Dinner on March 24. The Charter Dinner celebrates the founding of La Salle College on March 20, 1863, and pays tribute to the generations of Christian Brothers, laypersons, and clergy whose dedication has made La Salle the prominent institution it is today.

New Partnership

La Salle is bringing the business of the real world to the classroom. Through La Salle's partnership with Johnson & Johnson, business students have a unique opportunity to connect the theory of business with its practice. Executives from the consumer health care product giant conduct biweekly presentations on relevant business issues and further develop the materials and case studies covered in class. This Business Perspectives course and its expert-testimonial format provide business students with a firm foundation not only in business principles but in their applicability to a corporate setting. Those theories and principles that would ordinarily remain words on a page now have a direct relation to the working business practices of a multinational corporation in the health care industry.



'Sewing' the Seeds of Acceptance

By Kim Dugan

Fabric pieces and ink in the hands of La Salle University students have created a quilt symbolizing unity and acceptance. Proudly hung in the Union Building, the handiwork of a junior and her mother is a reminder that the University welcomes diversity among its campus community.

The idea for the "Diversity Quilt" originated from Jillian Conochan, a student from Freehold, N.J. "I wanted to do something to show that the people who are anti-diversity are the minority on this campus. I knew people would come forward to speak out against prejudice, and this was one way of doing that," said Conochan.

La Salle University Director of Multi-Cultural Affairs Cherylyn Rush (center), stands with several La Salle students in front of the school's "Diversity Quilt," made up of more than 50 hand-drawn sentiments expressing togetherness. Standing with Rush are (from left): Jose Santos, Jillian Conochan, Peter Laub, Robert Tucci, Courtney Aldridge, and Keynte Moore.

She was right. About 120 students participated in the creation of the 5' x 14' quilt by making a small cloth square with hand-drawn messages of acceptance and support. In addition to written quotations, some students drew symbols as a call for peace, friendship, and happiness. Each square is an embracing of diversity and differences campus-wide.

Debra Conochan, Jillian's mother, took on the task of sewing each piece into the quilt. "I was happy to help. I thought it was an absolutely wonderful idea. It was great to see a college campus come together for a cause like this," she said. "It took hours to do. I won't even tell Jillian how long, but it was a labor of love," she added.

Added Jillian, "We have gotten a lot of positive responses from the students and from the administration. People really like the statement it makes."

The Diversity Quilt visually depicts the value La Salle places on individuality. Because of this, the quilt has been shown to prospective freshmen on campus tours. Bob Voss, Dean of Admissions and Financial Aid, said, "The quilt is a clear picture of what we at La Salle represent. We are an open and accepting institution where students are encouraged to not only be themselves, but also to be proud of who they are and where they come from."

Public Health Careers Get a Boost

The La Salle Neighborhood Nursing Center has received a two-year grant of $40,000 from the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development (ASCD) to develop a project designed to increase students' knowledge of issues, methods, and careers in public health. They are implementing the project in collaboration with the Olney Cluster of the School District of Philadelphia.

The original funding from this extremely prestigious award emanated from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, one of the largest private foundations in the country. Moreover, the Neighborhood Nursing Center's project was one of only 10 funded nationwide out of 175 applications. In its own publication, ASCD indicates that these model programs "will develop integrated, experiential curriculums that enable students to address local needs by employing the best public health methods." La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center and its project have been featured on ASCD's web site.

Recruiting the Recruiter

The Explorers' new men's basketball coach is known for picking the best

By Jon Caroulis

Billy Hahn, the new head coach of men's basketball, stood at a podium before the press, the cameras clicking and the reporters scribbling. He cleared his throat, but the words did not come easily.

"Twenty-six years in the coaching business, and you're away from your family, and there are times when you wonder, 'Why am I doing this?' " he said in a voice filled with emotion. "I found out twice in the last week why. I had my first chance to go to the Final Four, which is a coach's dream. The second reason is to have a chance to be a head coach at an unbelievable institution like La Salle University." Hahn becomes the 17th head coach in the program's 71-year history.

"I liked the tradition at this university," he added. "They won a national championship here. They won an N.I.T. here. They've had All-Americans, and college players of the year. The basketball history of La Salle and the Big 5 speaks for itself. Anytime something has been done before, it can be done again. This isn't uncharted waters. It can happen again."

For the past 12 years Hahn had been the assistant head coach and then associate head coach at the University of Maryland. This past season, the Terrapins made it to the N.C.A.A.'s Final Four. Shortly after the tournament was over, La Salle Athletic Director Tom Brennan and Hahn were in touch by phone, and events moved quickly. After meeting with La Salle's President, Brother Michael J. McGinniss, Brennan offered Hahn the position and he accepted on April 4. He agreed to a five-year contract.

"I had a chance to speak with a number of terrific coaches," said Brennan of the selection process. "And it's clear to me Billy is an outstanding fit for La Salle and that he'll do a great job. He's known as a great recruiter and developer of talent."

Before Brennan began his search for a new head coach, he asked Rasual Butler, one of La Salle's best players, a question. Butler, Brennan knew, had been recruited by many top basketball programs before he decided on La Salle. "Who made the biggest impression on you?" he asked Butler.

"Billy Hahn," replied the player.

After graduating from Maryland in 1975 (where he played on one of the winningest Terps teams ever), Hahn immediately went into coaching, serving as an assistant at Morris Harvey College, then at Davidson College, the University of Rhode Island, and Ohio University. He was head coach at Ohio from 1986 to 1989. He joined the staff at Maryland as an assistant coach in 1989.

"It's great for him," said Maryland Head Coach Gary Williams. "It is a situation where he is going to a place that has a basketball tradition and is playing in a good league, the Atlantic 10. There are a lot of things there."

Born in Indiana, Hahn is no stranger to the Philadelphia area. He has recruited here for more than 20 years, landing many talented area players to his teams. "When I come here, I always order my three-course dinner: a soft pretzel, a cheese steak, and a Tastykake," he said.

Hahn and his wife, Kathi, have been married since 1976. They have a son, Matthew, and a daughter, Ashley.

Is it Time for Confession?

"I have a confession to make. Half of what we have taught you is in error, and furthermore, we cannot tell you which half it is."

Noted turn-of-the-century physician and educator Sir William Osler spoke these words as he addressed a Johns Hopkins medical school graduation class.

At first reading, Sir William's statement appears quite humorous. Upon further analysis, however, we see the brilliance of his message to these new doctors. He wanted them to realize that the science of medicine was constantly evolving and that they could not depend entirely on what they had learned in medical school. The receiving of a medical diploma did not signify that their educational work was done—it marked only the end of one phase and the beginning of the next.

The same can be said when it comes to one's estate plan.

Too often people go through the process of developing their estate plan, including the writing of a will, and then think that their work is done. The will is safely placed in the safe deposit box, and no further thought is given to it.

Just as a doctor should not rely entirely on what was learned in medical school, we should not rely entirely on an estate plan that was prepared more than a few years ago. Laws are subject to change, and a will that was properly drafted in accordance with the law at the time might no longer be the vehicle for accomplishing our estate planning goals. Perhaps, too, the person named to be the executor might no longer be the right choice.

Not only do laws change, but also, so do our circumstances. Changes in marital status, the maturing of our children, a change in our financial situation, and even something as simple as moving to a different state warrant a review of our estate plan. We may want to provide for our children differently, or, perhaps, now there are grandchildren to consider. Our philanthropic goals may have changed. Life insurance needs may be different. All of these changes must be communicated to your financial and legal advisors, so that they can be sure that a previously developed estate plan is still the best plan to meet our needs.

Even if you don't think that there have been any major life changes, it is a good idea to have your estate plan reviewed on a regular basis, (every three to five years), just to be sure that it's still the best plan to meet your needs.

It is said that confession can give you peace of mind—so can a review of your estate plan.

The Key to Management

Former President Herbert Hoover, former Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara, and James P. Meehan, Sr., '61: What do these people have in common? All have won the prestigious Taylor Key Award presented by the Society for Advancement of Management, or S.A.M.

Meehan, who is this year's winner of the Taylor Key Award, is founder and CEO of JPM International, a full-service executive search and recruitment firm in Mission Viejo, Calif. JPM International specializes in the fields of medicine and health care, telecommunications, consumer sales, manufacturing, and information technology.

The Taylor Key is one of the highest awards of S.A.M. and is a tribute to Frederick Taylor, the "Father of Scientific Management." To win this award is to be recognized by industry professionals for one's ongoing contributions to the development of modern management, and for reflecting in work and principles the philosophy of Frederick Taylor. Of winning the award, Meehan said he was "flabbergasted."

Meehan observed of his undergraduate experience: "La Salle gave me a great opportunity. It enabled me to get my degree." He still keeps in touch with the University and recently attended his 40-year reunion.

Following graduation, Meehan served in the military before he and his wife of 47 years, Kathleen Widermeier, began their westward journey. Meehan worked for 17 years at Johnson & Johnson in Chicago, and with pharmaceutical giant GD Searle. After fine-tuning his management skills at major corporations in various cities around the country (including Philadelphia) he and Kathleen settled in Northern California, where he established JPM International in 1980.

Founded in 1912, S.A.M.'s mission is "to provide an opportunity for the members to increase management skills and expertise through participation in programs and services designed to improve the professional quality of their knowledge, performance, and leadership ability."

The Taylor Key Award was presented to Meehan at S.A.M.'s International Management Conference in Las Vegas on March 20.

A Time for Healing

As each of us struggles to come to terms with the enormity of the events of September 11th and their horrific human toll, please know that you all are in my thoughts and prayers. We are one in our shock and grief.

I would also like you to know that La Salle is responding to our national crisis by offering opportunities to assist the relief efforts and ways to cope with the personal reactions we have to our national tragedy. Please visit the home page of the University's web site (www.lasalle.edu) to see how we're trying to help.

In addition, we want to know about members of the La Salle family directly affected by the terrorist attacks. We would like to learn about those who have died or are missing and about those who have survived or have been involved in the relief efforts.

Would you please help us? If you have been affected or have information about other Lasallians (alumni, students or friends, as well as current or former faculty, administrators and staff members), please share it with La Salle's Office of Alumni Relations. You can do that either by sending in the form at the bottom of this page, by filling out the information form on the University's Website homepage referenced here, or by phoning 215/951-1535. My hope is that we'll be able to reach out to these members of the La Salle community as appropriate.

As our country faces great trials and challenges, I ask all Lasallians to focus on the need for healing, for service, and for trust in God to see America safely through the times ahead.

Finally, I ask that you continue to pray for the victims of the September 11th attacks, for the courageous relief workers, and for the brave men and women defending our country from its enemies.

Sincerely,

Brother Michael

Speech-Language-Hearing Moves Toward Accreditation

The School of Nursing's Master's degree program in Speech-Language-Hearing Science has been awarded candidacy status from the Council on Academic Accreditation in Audiology and Speech-Language Pathology (C.A.A.).

Candidacy precedes full accreditation and indicates that the curriculum is sufficient to allow a graduate of that program to meet the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association (ASHA) Certificate of Clinical Competence (CCC) Standards.

To practice in most work settings, speech-language pathologists must hold a Master's degree and become certified by ASHA.

"The Speech-Language-Hearing Science Program expands the opportunities for our students and our community and is a good example of how we try to stay in touch with their needs," said Zane Robinson Wolf, Dean of the School of Nursing.

Speech-language pathology was listed as one of the fastest growing occupations in a recent report by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics. Speech-language-pathologists care for patients of all ages with communication disorders.

The program combines academic course work and clinical experiences. Affiliations with many local hospitals, clinics, schools, and rehabilitation facilities enrich the clinical experiences of the students.

Students Go 3-D Thanks to Think3 Software Grant

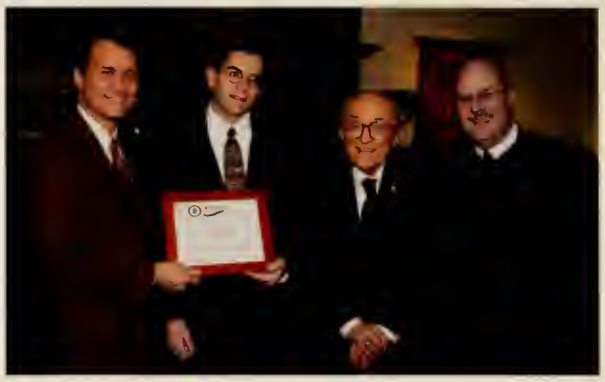
Think3 has awarded La Salle University Digital Arts and Multimedia Design a software grant in the amount of $499,100 for thinkdesign 6.0. This software package is used for building 3-D objects and animations.

The package will become a tool used in CSC 210 Creating Multimedia course. Students will learn the basics of 3-D design, creation and animation.

Some new courses will be developed involving Web-based gaming along with an expanded course on 3-D design techniques.

This software package will be used in both of these new classes along with the current animation course.

Some of the projects produced from this course will include games, tutorials, virtual sale campaigns and interactive Websites.



Flubacher Award Celebrated – Henry C. Franz, a resident of Levittown, Pa., received this year's Joseph F. Flubacher Leadership Award for demonstrating significant leadership in student organizations and University governance. Franz was a Resident Advisor for three years and La Salle's Channel 56 Creative Producer. "The people at La Salle enhanced my time here. I really enjoyed working on the TV station as well. It helped me develop my creativity," said Franz. From left, David T. Poiesz, '80, La Salle Trustee and Honorary Chair of the Flubacher Scholarship Committee; Franz; Dr. Joseph Flubacher, Professor Emeritus; and Br. Michael McGinniss, La Salle President.

There's More Than One Way to Give Back

When most alumni and friends think about giving to La Salle, they get out their checkbooks. However, there are a variety of ways to show your financial support.

Securities – If you own securities that have appreciated in value, you are subject to capital gains taxation rules when they are sold. By making a gift of these appreciated securities to La Salle, you avoid capital gains taxes and receive a charitable deduction. Thus, the actual cost to you is often far less than the value of your gift.

Real Estate – You may make a gift of your residence or other real estate to the University. As with gifts of appreciated securities, you avoid capital gains taxes and receive a charitable deduction.

Life Insurance – If you own a fully-paid life insurance policy that has outlived its original purpose, you may wish to donate it to La Salle. You will receive a charitable deduction based on the present value of the policy (an amount close to the cash value). You may also name La Salle to be the beneficiary of any life insurance policy that you own. Although you will not receive a charitable deduction, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that future students will benefit from your gift.

Bequests – A bequest to La Salle is a gift that involves no immediate loss of capital or income. There are several different types of bequests, and we would be happy to discuss various options with you and your attorney. Your estate will receive a charitable deduction, and the tax savings can reduce the ultimate cost to your heirs.

Trusts – Many people believe that trusts are for the wealthy. Often, however, those with limited assets establish trusts to preserve their capital and increase the earnings derived from it. You may establish a trust that will permit you to make a gift to La Salle (and receive a charitable deduction), while increasing your income. We would be happy to discuss with you and your attorney the various types of trusts that you can establish to benefit La Salle.

Zarrilli Honored with Second E-Vision Award

Stephen Zarrilli, '83, former president of US Interactive and currently Chairman, C.E.O. and President of Concellera Software, Inc., of Malvern, Pa., received the University's second annual E-Vision Award for contributions to the field of electronic commerce.

"Steve was honored for his entrepreneurial spirit, of seeing a need in the marketplace, building a company to meet that need, and then launching the company as a world leader," said Paul Brazina, Director of La Salle's E-Commerce Institute, which presents the award.

Annual Holroyd Award and Lecture Celebrate Extraordinary Careers in Medicine

Dr. C. Jules Rominger, M.D., FACR, a 1946 graduate of La Salle, was the recipient of the 2001 Holroyd Award. Dr. Rominger, a radiologist, continues an active practice in radiation oncology at Mercy Catholic Medical Center.

He graduated from Jefferson Medical College in 1948 and entered the U.S. Army. Afterwards, he became a radiologist at Philadelphia's Misericordia Hospital in 1954 and became Chairman of the Radiology Department. From 1972 to 1991 he was Chairman of the Department of Radiation Therapy of Mercy Catholic Medical Center. He has authored more than 100 papers and posters on cancer research.

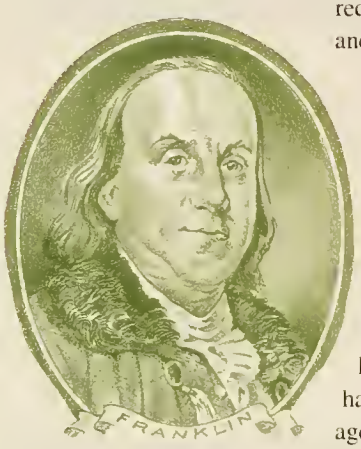
Dr. William P. Magee, Jr., D.D.S., M.D., FACS, a leading plastic and craniofacial surgeon, delivered the Holroyd lecture. He devotes half his professional life performing reconstructive surgery on children with facial deformities as a volunteer to Operation Smile, which he founded with his wife, Kathleen. He oversees its World Care program, which provides funding to bring children to the United States for free surgery. He was the first recipient of the Conrad N. Hilton Humanitarian Prize for exemplary and significant contributions to ease human suffering.

Dr. William P. Magee, Jr.

The Holroyd Award and Lecture are named for Dr. Roland Holroyd, a professor of biology at La Salle for 53 years.

ISBT Program Receives $100,000 Commitment from Ben Franklin Partners

La Salle University's Integrated Science, Business and Technology Program (ISBT) has received a $100,000 commitment as part of Ben Franklin Technology Partners Young Entrepreneurs Challenge Fund Program. This program will provide seed funding to La Salle students who have high technology business concepts that require feasibility studies and start-up support.



This commitment requires that the University raise $100,000 in matching funds from its alumni/ae. Student projects will be supported on a 50-50 basis from both funds.

La Salle graduates who have founded and managed their own business ventures will also be invited to serve as mentors, advising students in all facets of entrepreneurship.

Ben Franklin Technology Partners Young Entrepreneurs Challenge Fund will be administered through a partnership of the Ben Franklin Technology Partners and those colleges and universities in the region that are interested in participating. The entrepreneurs will be obligated to repay the investment if their business ventures are successful, thereby creating a revolving fund.

Ben Franklin Technology Partners is a statewide network that fosters innovation to stimulate Pennsylvania's economic growth and prosperity. Ben Franklin Technology Partners brings together the best of Pennsylvania's people, ideas, and technology to serve as a catalyst for advancing the state's knowledge-based economy.

If you are interested in learning more about the Young Entrepreneur Challenge program at La Salle, please call Professor Marsha Timmerman at 215/951-5133 or email her at timmerman@lasalle.edu.

Calling All High-Tech Alumni

Silicon Philly. TechnoPhilly. These are just a few names associated with the Delaware Valley these days.

Maybe you are an entrepreneur. Maybe you are employed by a start-up. Maybe you are thinking about establishing your own start-up. Or, maybe you are working with a telecommunications, information technology, or healthcare organization. Right now, the Delaware Valley is a hub of activity for these ventures and sectors.

And, La Salle University is proud to have so many of its graduates represented in this ever-growing and constantly changing environment.

We are calling all alumni! If you are interested in connecting with other alumni in the high-tech sector, please contact the Office of Alumni Relations at 215/951-1535, e-mail alumni@lasalle.edu, or mail this form to the Office of Alumni Relations, 1900 West Olney Ave., Philadelphia, PA, 19141, to become included in this network.

We will gather names of interested alumni so that we can keep in touch with you about future networking opportunities, alumni events, and La Salle lectures or presentations that could impact your high-tech interests and initiatives.

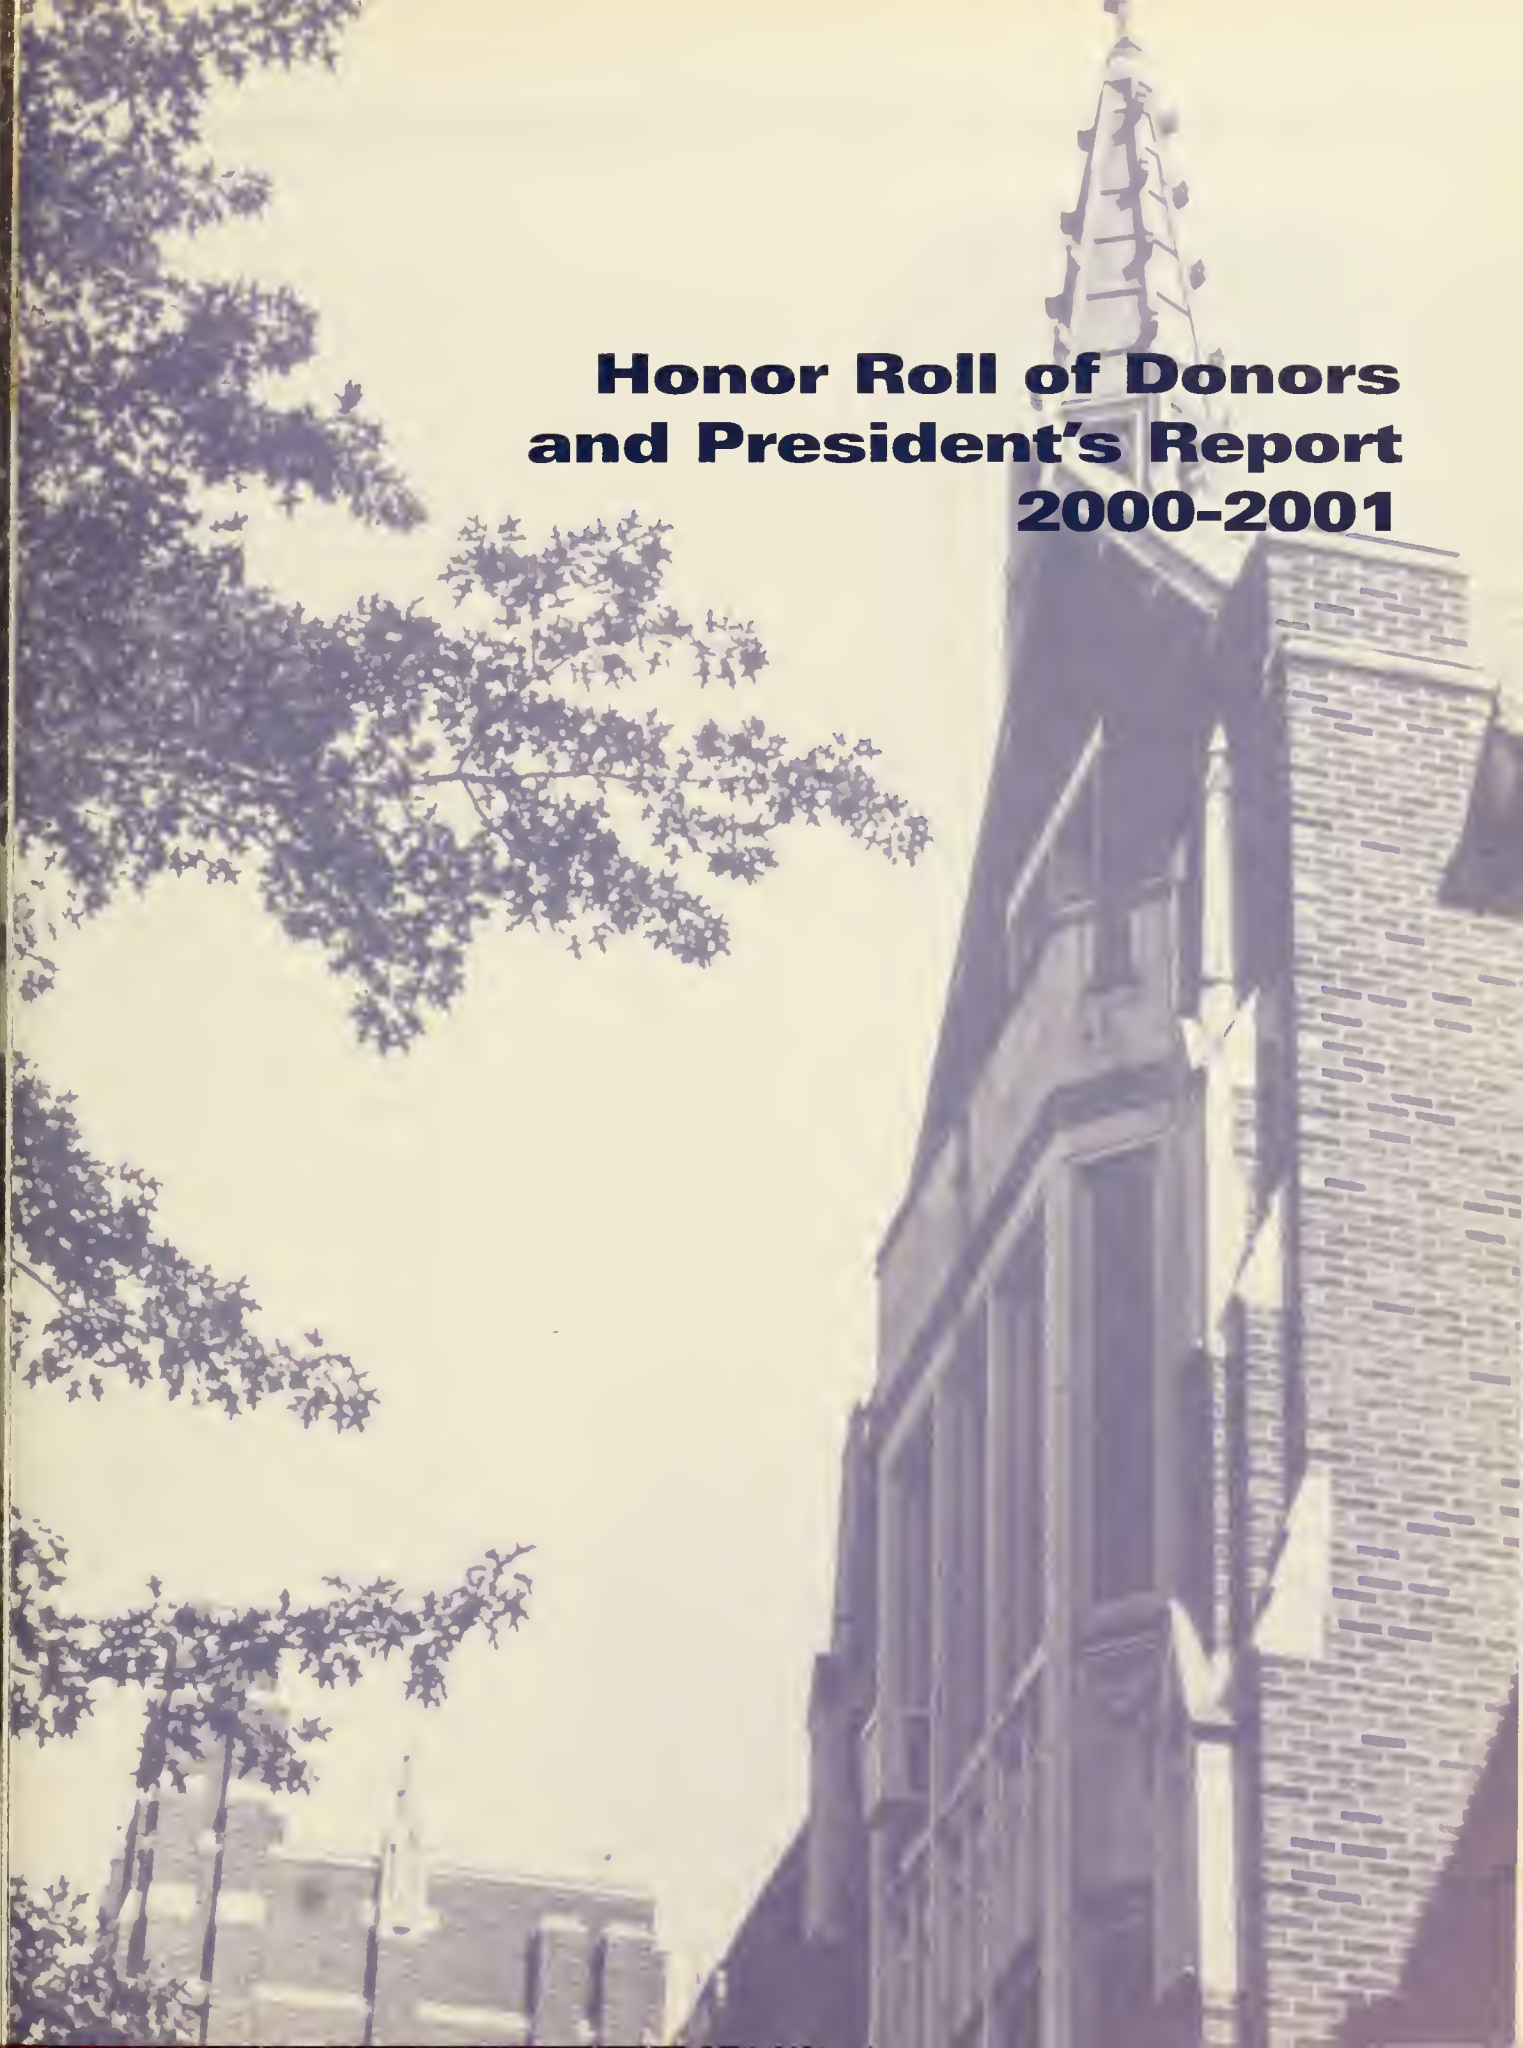
Honor Roll of Donors and President's Report 2000-2001



We remain intensely focused on students, helping them achieve their potential and preparing them for the social, political, moral and religious challenges of contemporary society.

Dear Friends of La Salle:

On behalf of the University and our students, I want to offer my heartfelt thanks to all our loyal benefactors. With your help, La Salle continued to build on its heritage of success in the 2001 academic year, preparing the way for even greater achievements in the future.

The generosity and the trust of the thousands of supporters whom we recognize in the following report are truly invaluable assets for the University. Here I can only highlight a few of the very positive trends that your investment in La Salle has fostered, but I do want to emphasize that I see the beneficial impact of your support in many ways every day and am continually encouraged by it.

For several years, La Salle has been committing significant resources to the development of new academic programs to prepare students for leadership in the 21st century. This investment continued to bear fruit in the 2001 academic year, as new programs in Integrated Science, Business, and Technology (ISBT) and Speech-Language-Hearing Science successfully completed their first year, attracting a solid enrollment of students with strong academic credentials. The year also saw our successful introduction of a new core curriculum, fostering interdisciplinary problem solving and using the city of Philadelphia as a key educational resource.

With these new developments, and many more like them, one thing has not changed at La Salle. We remain intensely focused on students, helping them achieve their potential and preparing them for the social, political, moral and religious challenges of contemporary society. This is in keeping with the over 300-year-old tradition of the Christian Brothers to which the University proudly remains faithful. The success of our academic initiatives is clearly reflected in the growing number of students seeking admission to La Salle. For the fifth straight year, we have received a record high number of applications. Our enrollment continues to increase as well, exceeding even our own goals for the Class of 2005.

Importantly, almost 100 of the freshmen who entered in August 2001 declared interest in majors that did not exist here just four years ago. In addition, we are attracting students with stronger academic credentials, as measured by SAT scores and class ranking, than we have seen in a decade or more.

La Salle also continues to receive recognition in terms of awards and greater levels of grant support from government agencies, private foundations and corporations. A good example of such recognition is the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Community Services Excellence Award received by La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center (NNC) in November 2000. The work of our NNC is just one illustration of how the University strives to enhance the quality of life in our surrounding community. This is a core value of the University, deeply rooted in our Catholic identity.

So, in many ways, the first year of the new millennium was an auspicious one for the University. But we cannot build on that momentum without increased support from our benefactors, especially our alumni. I look forward to working with you and with many new supporters as we strive to take La Salle to an even higher level of excellence.

Many thanks, again, for your generosity to La Salle and to our students.

Sincerely yours,

Brother Michael

Honor Roll 2000 – 2001

Gifts and grants reported in this section of the President's Report reflect donations received by the University between June 1, 2000 and May 31, 2001. Contributions are reported in accordance with CASE (Council for Advancement and Support of Education) standards. Income during Fiscal Year '01 may include any of the following: gifts of cash; gifts of stock; matching gifts; bequests; planned gifts; independently appraised gifts-in-kind; real estate; gifts of paid-up life insurance; and new pledges. We also report government grants for which the University has applied and been funded.

Every effort has been made to ensure the accuracy of the donor list. If a name has been misspelled/omitted, or if a gift has been reported incorrectly, we appreciate your assistance in reporting it to the Office for University Advancement at 215/951-1539.

Bequests

We fondly remember the following individuals who have passed away and who have included La Salle in their wills. Their thoughtful planning helps safeguard La Salle's mission for many years to come.

Mr. Walter M. Czarnota '52
Mr. William J. Good
Ms. Beatrice A. Walsh

Planned Gifts

In 2000-2001, two people notified La Salle of their intentions to make planned gifts to the University:

Mr. and Mrs. John Kapusnick (Kathleen Burns Kapusnick '75)
Mr. William J. Leimkuhler '65

John C Stipa
Paul J Strus
Mary Beth Tecce
Diana (Barnes) Thurmond
Edward A and Patrice (Lamb) Trauffer, M D

Fulbright Scholars

Two recent graduates, Nick Susi, '01, and Christopher Steinitz, '00, are spending the next few years abroad studying politics and culture after receiving the prestigious Fulbright Scholarship.

Steinitz, a political science major, is living in Kuwait, studying the opposition to women's political rights. Susi, who majored in German, is in Austria researching the writings and father-son relationship of Fritz and Ernst Molden, a prominent literary and publishing family.

Nick Susi, '01

After meeting a Kuwaiti official at the University's Diplomat-in-Residence Conference, Steinitz became intrigued with Middle Eastern politics. Even though he applied late for the program, he was accepted. "About a week and a half after I had heard the news, I was off to Middlebury College in Vermont for a nine-week crash course in Arabic," he said.

Susi said he was "walking around in a daze" after hearing he'd been accepted. Unlike Steinitz, Susi will not have any language problems overseas; and in fact will be teaching English at a high school in Vienna as part of his studies.

Steinitz and Susi are the 50th and 51st La Salle students to receive a Fulbright Scholarship since 1965.

Chris Steinitz, '00 on Camel

La Salle Fulbright recipients have traveled to Mexico, France, Fiji, New Zealand, Korea and Yugoslavia. In 14 of the past 31 years, more than one La Salle student was awarded a Fulbright (in 1974 five students received it). About half the recipients have majored in German, but other majors include economics, history, education, chemistry and other foreign languages.

Michael Goetter, '93

Paul Brazina, Executive Director of La Salle's Electronic Commerce Institute, had gotten a call from a company called "The Sycamore Group," who wanted to meet with him. Brazina had no idea what to expect once he got there.

He was greeted by 28-year-old Michael Goetter, '93, its co-founder and executive vice president and a La Salle graduate.

In so many words, Goetter explained that he was able to attend the University on a Christian Brothers Scholarship–otherwise college would have been difficult. "Without that scholarship, a college education would have been really tough to afford, and I definitely couldn't have gone to La Salle," he said.

His company, founded in 1997, was making inroads in e-commerce; its workforce would double soon. He had heard about Brazina's work, and wanted to help out in any way he could, as a way of giving back to La Salle.

Goetter has become a member of the Institute's advisory board; his Director of Information Management, Anne Marie Smith, '96, has spoken to students at Institute lectures; and he's helped Brazina make contacts with other leaders in the e-commerce field. (It was Smith who heard about Brazina and suggested Goetter give him a call.)

He's also done much more: Brazina says Goetter helped develop the lecture series for the E-Commerce Fellows program and has provided speakers for it. He also helped design the structure and content of the new E-Commerce Certificate Program.

In addition, Sycamore is designing a state-of-the-art Website for the Institute. "And Goetter has contacted other young alums and generated interest to get involved with our e-commerce program," says Brazina.

Dana Buchanan, '99

La Salle University is one of the few schools in the Philadelphia area that owns a Scanning Electron Microscope (SEM). Thanks to alumni donations and a substantial grant from the Housing and Urban Development Division of the federal government, students–and other area colleges and universities–are able to use this instrument for a variety of research projects.

All of these projects are ideal learning experiences and some have the potential to make a significant impact in their fields, which is the case with Dana Buchanan, '99.

Buchanan is in her third year of medical school at Philadelphia College of Osteopathic Medicine (PCOM) and has returned to La Salle to do her part in an experimental research project that may be put to use in hospitals worldwide.

Dr. Charlotte Green, Ph.D., Buchanan's supervisor, and other researchers at PCOM were looking to pair with another institution that had a SEM when Buchanan mentioned her work with one at La Salle. This led to the two schools collaborating on the project.

Technically speaking, Buchanan is working on an aortic graft project. To put it in simpler terms, she is working on a way to improve the current technology used to repair weakened vessels, such as the aorta, in patients.

Dana Buchanan, '99

Physicians "graft" or add material to the vessel's wall to help strengthen it. Because the synthetic graft is foreign to the human body several problems can occur, such as infections and blood clotting.

Perhaps the biggest difficulty with synthetic grafts is that they are only temporary. Eventually they fail and the patient's original condition resurfaces. It is likely that young patients will need to undergo several operations throughout their lifetime.

"Trust me," said Buchanan, "you do not want more than one graft replacement, so this research is really important."

Researchers hope to lessen these problems by using biosynthetic material–potentially using tissue from donated organs–to create the graft.

Studies have shown that using biosynthetic material to correct vessel impairment is less likely to cause infection and there are less blood clotting problems. In addition, because the material has a biological base, the graft will literally connect with the patient's tissue and become part of his or her body. This allows the graft to grow along with the patient to ensure lifelong efficiency.

Buchanan's research is paving the way for full biological grafts to be performed. Her role in the aortic graft project is to use the microscope to scan the surface of the graft in the research model to see if the biosynthetic graft is merging with the vessel.

"It looks very promising so far," said Buchanan. "The grafts I am looking at now have only been in place for about three months so we have a lot of work ahead of us."

Although her research has a long way to go, the expertise Buchanan developed through her work with the SEM at La Salle has enabled her to play a key role in this groundbreaking study.

Elsie Hartigan, '01

An award-winning pediatric nurse and single mother of two, Elsie Hartigan, '01, credits La Salle University as a major contributor in achieving her goals.

The second graduate from La Salle's Licensed Practical Nurse (LPN) to Bachelor of Science in Nursing (BSN) Program, "thirty-something" Hartigan was able to go back to school full-time after receiving the Helene Fuld Grant for $10,000 to help with educational expenses.

"La Salle was so accommodating," she said. "They accepted so many of my credits. I knew I couldn't pass up this opportunity."

Not only did she successfully balance work and school with two sons at home, but Hartigan was on the Dean's List every semester and was chosen to deliver the closing speech at her class' nursing pinning ceremony.

Her efforts were recently recognized nationally when she was named "Nurse of the Year" by her employer, Bayada Pediatrics.

La Salle University Chairman, Board of Trustees

James J. Lynch, '71, President and C.E.O. of Fleet Bank-Pennsylvania, has been elected Chairman of the Board of Trustees at La Salle University, his alma mater.

"Thirty years after graduating and getting together this year for my 30th reunion with my classmates, I'm coming back as Chairman of the Board. It's hard to believe," said Lynch, who's been a board member since 1992.

University President Brother Michael McGinniss, F.S.C., said, "I'm delighted Jim has accepted this position. I know that he'll provide outstanding leadership."

"We want to build our endowment and fundraising," said Lynch, "particularly in the area of scholarships for deserving students. Anyone who wants to come to La Salle for the quality education we provide, for the Lasallian values we teach, should be able to follow his or her dreams."

A 1971 graduate with a degree in marketing, Lynch and his wife, Kathy, a 1977 La Salle graduate, live in Lafayette Hill, Pa.

Kerri and Eric

Eric Bucher, back and left, with beard

The La Salle family lost two special members this past spring with the deaths of Kerri Lynn Bessette (2004) and Eric Bucher (2003).

Kerri, a freshman education/special education major from Rhode Island, died April 12 from meningitis. Eric, a sophomore pre-med/German major from Philadelphia, died in a car accident May 11 while traveling to attend his brother's college graduation ceremony.

Kerri Lynn Bessette

Each represented the best of Lasallian values in their commitment to helping others. Kerri, who was a member of the University's track team, tutored at an elementary school and was remembered by her friends and teammates as a caring and giving person. Eric volunteered in after-school programs for children living near campus and had planned to volunteer at a children's hospital this fall. He was remembered by friends and co-students as being enthusiastic and compassionate.

The La Salle Community celebrated Kerri's life this past Spring with a Memorial Service on the Campus Quad. Eric's special gifts will be remembered at a ceremony during the annual Branch Out Day October 6.
